" they left it, and continued quiet on board for some time. The Libyans finding this, a 46 made an addition to what they had before deposited; and if this proved insuffi-" cient, they continued increasing the original quantity of gold till the Carthaginians 66 were satisfied, and the bargain made. Neither of these nations offered the least " injustice to the other. The Carthaginians did not so much as touch the Libyan " gold till it was of equal value with their wares, nor the Libyans the Carthaginian " merchandize, till the gold they offered as an equivalent was accepted and taken " away."

SECT. IV.

The chronology of the Carthaginians.

Carthaginian chronology the ame with the Phœnician.

HE Carthaginian chronology was at first the Phanician, already by us con- b fidered, and, in all probability, ever afterwards, as to its form and manner, agreed with it. That the Carthaginians kept records in the same manner as their ancestors the Tyrians did, cannot well be doubted; especially, if we consider, how closely they adhered to the customs and maxims of those ancestors. Sir Isaac Newton feems to imagine, that the artificial chronology of Eratosthenes did not absolutely prevail amongst the Romans even in the Augustan age, but thinks that Virgil might have taken some of his historical facts from the records of Carthage; which evidently supposes, that these records might then have existed. Servius seems to infinuate, that they, or at least some part of them, were in being when he wrote; for he tells us, that, according to the Carthaginians themselves, Dido came from a town called c Charta. But, however this may be, 'tis certain, from Solinus and others, that annals, and an epoch, at the destruction of their city, the Carthaginians must have had; otherwise the Romans could never have known how many years had elapsed from the foundation to the destruction of that metropolis, as we find they did. But this is so apparent, that we shall insist no further upon ite.

THE method of computing time from the building of cities was in use throughout a good part of the east in very early ages, though it was of a later date at Rome, particularly amongst the Lydians, Syrians and Phanicians, as it was likewise amongst their descendants the old Etruscans and Carthaginians. This is evident beyond contradiction from Diodorus Siculus, Censorinus, Scaliger, and a famous inscription, whose d epoch is the foundation of Interamna in Umbria, which Gruter, and Justus Fontaninus, in his antiquities of Horta, have given us f.

Their year lunifolar,

THE antient year of the Phanicians, as well as that of the other eastern nations, was most certainly luni solar, i. e. it consisted of twelve lunar months, containing thirty days each, with intercalary months to make up what the twelve lunar months wanted of the folar year. At length the Egyptians of Thebes, according to Diodorus and Strabo, introduced the solar year, i. e. they added five days annually to the twelve lunar months, in order to make them agree with the course of the sun. Now as the computation by folar years did not take place even in Egypt 'till the time of Amenophis, (tho' the difference betwixt the solar and calendar years was discovered e in the reign of Ammon, the father of Sefac) i. e. about an hundred and thirty-seven years before the æra of Nabenassar; nor amongst the Chaldwans or Babylonians 'till the commencement of that æra; and as Dido's departure from Tyre was at least coeval with, if it did not precede the former of these events, the luni-solar year was, without dispute, observed then by the Phanicians, and consequently afterwards by the Carthaginians 8.

As was that of the Arabians and Damafcenes.

In confirmation of which we must not omit remarking, that Simplicius, in his commentary on the first of Aristotle's physical acroasis, affirms the Damascenes and Arabians, who were either neighbours to the posterity of the old Phanicians, or intermixed with them, to have had the luni-folar year in use amongst them so late as his time; from whence 'tis not a little probable, that this was always the Phanician and Carthaginian year h.

E NEWTON'S chronol. p. 65, 66, &c. SERV. in Æn. i. & Æn. iv. SOLIN. C. 29. f Diop. Sic. l.v.c. 1.

We have nothing very material to offer farther on this head, the Carthaginian annals having for a long series of ages been destroyed. As therefore we cannot pretend to give any tolerable particular account, much less a methodical system, of the Carthaginian chronology, all that can be done in order to satisfy our readers, is, to exhibit to their view a chronological table of some sew of the principal transactions in which that samous republic was concerned, including a list of several of its great men, in order of time, as they lived.

The Monarchy of CARTHAGE.

	· · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · ·
b		YEAR OF CARTHAGE.	YEAR before CHRIST.
	DIDO, the daughter of Mettinus, king of Tyre, founded Carthage. How long she reigned there, history informs us not.		890 or 892
	The Republic of CARTHAGE.
e	AFTER Dido's death, there is a chasm in the history of Cartbage for above three hundred years. Only from Justin we learn, that this state was much agitated by intestine commotions during part of that period.
	The Carthaginians plant a colony in the island Ebusus or Eresus, on the coast of Spain, according to Diodorus.  The Tyrrhenian and Carthaginian united sleets are, according to Herodotus, after a bloody engagement, put to slight by	160	730
	the Phocæans, in the sea of Sardinia.  Which action is likewise mentioned by Thucydides, who relates, that the city of Massilia, at present Marseilles,	347	543
đ	built by the said Phoceans, was then in its infancy (A). Macheus, a samous general, gains some very considerable advantages over the Africans, with whom the Carthaginians are now ingaged in a war. This happened, as appears probable from comparing Justin with Orosius, towards the conclusion of Cyrus's reign, or that of his uncle Cyaxares II.
	and therefore we may place it about the year He reduces part of Sicily to the obedience of the Carthagi-	353	537
	A plague makes great havock at Cartbage about this time, when the Cartbaginians endeavour to appeale the gods by	354	536
t	facrificing children.  After a long and successful war in Sicily, the Carthaginian army, under the command of Machaus, thinks proper to	355	535 retire from that island.  The same army afterwards invading Sardinia, is intirely	360	530
	defeated by the Sardi, and the greatest part of it cut off.	360	530

(A) That this most ancient naval engagement happened not far from the year in which our most learned archbishop Usher has placed it, is, in some measure, evident from a circumstance taken notice of by Thucydides in his first book, where he mentions it. That author informs us, that this event happened not long after the foundation of Massilia. Or Marseilles, which was built by the Phoceans. Now its afferted by Timeus Siculus, that Massilia was founded by the Phoceans an hundred and twenty years before the battle of Salamis, which falls in with the first year of the forty-fifth olympiad, and consequently the foundation of Massilia preceded the action under consideration sifty-seven years. It might then therefore very justly be said, as Thucydides relates, to have been in its infancy. That Massia was built by the Phoceans about the time mentioned by Timeus, is consirmed by Artssociety, Harpocration, Scymnus Chius, Justin, Atheneus, and other authors. Both Thucydides and Herodotus likewise seem to relate some events after this, as happening in the time of Cambyses; which may be looked upon as an additional argument in desence of our learned primate's notion, which he has taken from Eusebius (1).

(1) Ush. ad an. per. Jul. 4171. Herodot. l.i. Timeus Sic. apud Marcian. in perieg. Solin. Euseb. in chron. ad olymp. 45, 1. 59, 2. &c. Aristot. apud Harpocration. in νος. Μασσαλία, Athen. deipnosoph. l. xiii. Just. l. xiiii. Strab. l. iv. Stymnus Chius, Ammian. Marcellin. 15, 23. Gell. noct. At. 10, 16, &c.

	YEAR OF CARTHAGE.	YEAR before a CHRIST.
The remaining part, upon their return home, are banished by their countrymen, together with Machaus the general. Incented at this barbarous treatment, they attack Carthage,		J
carry the city, and, after putting ten fenators to death, fettle the republic upon its former footing.	360	590
Machæus crucifies his fon about the fame time.	360	530 530
Some time after this the same general, being accused of a defign to make himself absolute, is punished with death, and succeeded by Mago in the command of the army.	067	!
An alliance formed between the Carthaginians and the Ro-	367	523 b mans the year after the regifuge, in the consulship of Brutus	•
and Valerius.	382	508
Mago, after the introduction of military discipline amongst the Caribaginians, dies, leaving their forces in an excellent condition. If Justin is to be credited, this seems to have happened some years before Darius Hystaspis died; and therefore we may look upon it to fall in justly enough with Soon after Mago's death, his two fons Asdrubal and Hamilear	401	489 attempt the conquest of Sardinia, as likewise to free their		С country from the annual tribute imposed upon them by the Africans.	401	489
Darius fends embassadors to Carthage to demand a body of auxiliaries against their common enemy the Greeks, for a war with whom he was then making very great preparations, · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · ·	402	488
At first Astrobal and Hamilear seem to have had great success in Sardinia, by the number of triumphs Justin assigns Astronomy Astronomy in Sardinia, but towards the conclusion of this war, Astronomy		d bal is mortally wounded, and the intire command of the army thereby devolves upon his brother Hamilear.	404	486
A treaty of peace is concluded between the Africans and Carthaginians about this period, by which the annual tri- bute of the latter is continued.	405	485
The Sicilians implore the affiftance of Leonidas, to enable them to shake off the Carthaginian yoke.	405	4 <sup>8</sup> 5
Not long after this Hamilear is killed in Sicily , leaving behind him three fons, Hamileo or Himileo , Hanno , and Gifeo .	410	480
After the death of Hamilear, and the total defeat of the	410	c Carthaginian army by Gelon, a peace is made, and Gisco,
the fon of Hamilear, banished.	410	480
The Carthaginians engage at once in a war with the Moors, Numidians, and other Africans; the refult of which is,	. :
that they are excused the annual tribute before exacted of them.	430	4 60
Some time after this period the two brothers Philani facrificed themselves for the honour, as they apprehended, of their country.
The centumvirate instituted, somewhere in this interval, to reduce		f
the exorbitant power of Mago's family within proper bounds, and be a curb upon their generals, according to Justin. Hannibal, the son of Gisco, makes an expedition into Sicily,	•
takes and razes Selinus and Himera.	482	408
The fame general, in conjunction with Imilcar, makes another campaign in Sicily; but dies of the plague in his camp before Agrigentum, of which diftemper a great part of his army likewise perishes.	486	404
Imilcar, Hannibal's collegue, takes Agrigentum.	486	404
He likewise reduces Gela.	486	404 g He
		1.10

He puts an end to this war by a treaty concluded with Dianyifus.  Dianyifus takes Motya from the Carthaginians.  Dianyifus takes Motya from the Carthaginians.  Himileo retakes Motya by florm, reduces Melfana, and razes it. Mago, the Carthaginian admiral, likewike defeats the Sicilian fleet under Lepines. Himileo advances with his army, drawn up in order of battle, to the very walls of Syracufe, and plunders the temples of Ceres and Professina in the fuburb of Aradina; but the plague carrying off a great part of his troops, he is obliged to withdraw.  The Africans, to the number of two hundred thouland, feize upon Tainis, and threaten Cartbage itielf. But famine and divisions oblige them at laft to disperfe. Himileo, not being able to furvive his misfortunes, puts an end to them by a voluntary death.  Mago, the Carthaginian general, is routed by Dionyfins at Abacenum.  A fecond peace concluded between Dionyfus and the Carthaginians.  Dionyfus routs the Carthaginians at Cabala in Sicily, but is beaten by them at Cronion, upon which a peace ensure.  A plague breaks out in Carthage, which tweeps away an infinite number of people. The Africans and Sardirife up in arms, and endeavour to render themselves independent of the Cartbaginian state. A particular species of madness seizes many of the inhabitants of Carthage, and produces dismal effects there.  Dionysius advances, with an army of thirty thousand foot, and three thousand horse, into the Carthaginian territories. With this force he son takes Schuus and Entella, and plunders all the adjacent country. The Carthaginians, on the other hand, enter the port of Erys with two hundred fail, and carry off most of the best Syracussan galleys laid up in that harbour.  Dionysius II. succeeding his father, comes to an accommodation with the Carthaginian governor of Minoa, permits Dion to land five thousand arms there, and supplies him with carriages to convey them to Syracusses, which means that prince is enabled to proceed in his expedition against Dionysius II.  Timoleon b	ı		YEAR OF CARTHAGE.	YEAR before CHRIST.
Dionysius takes Matya from the Cartbaginians.  Himileo retakes Matya by florm, reduces Messana, and razes it. Mago, the Cartbaginian admiral, likewise deseats the Sicilian steet under Leptines. Himileo advances with his army, drawn up in order of battle, to the very walls of Syracuse, and plunders the temples of Ceres and Proserpina in the suburb of Aeradina; but the plague carrying off a great part of his troops, he is obliged to withdraw.  The Africans, to the number of two hundred thousand, seize upon Tunis, and threaten Cartbage itself. But samine and divisions oblige them at last to disperse. Himileo, not being able to survive his misfortunes, puts an end to them by a voluntary death.  Mago, the Cartbaginian general, is routed by Dionysius at Abacamum.  A second peace concluded between Dionysius and the Cartbaginians.  Dionysius routs the Cartbaginians at Cabala in Sicily, but is beaten by them at Cronion, upon which a peace ensure.  A plague breaks out in Cartbage, which iweeps away an infinite number of people. The Africans and Sardi rise up in arms, and endeavour to render themselves independent of the Cartbaginian state. A particular species of madness feizes many of the inhabitants of Cartbage, and produces dismal effects there.  Dionysius advances, with an army of thirty thousand foot, and three thousand hores, into the Cartbaginian territories.  With this force he soon takes Scienus and Entella, and plunders all the adjacent country. The Cartbaginians, on the other hand, enter the port of Eryx with two hundred fail, and carry off most of the best Syracustans, and three thousand hores, into the Cartbaginians and three thousand norte, into the Cartbaginians, on the other hand, enter the port of Eryx with two hundred fail, and carry off most of the best Syracustans, and lands his forces in Sicily by a stratagem.  Paralus, the Cartbaginians governor of Minoa, permits Dion to land five thousand arms there, and supplies him with carriages to convey them to Syracuse, by which means that prince is enabled t			0.6
great part of his troops, he is obliged to withdraw.  The Africans, to the number of two hundred thousand, seize upon Tunis, and threaten Carthage itself. But famine and divisions oblige them at last to disperse. Himilto, not being able to survive his missfortunes, puts an end to them by a voluntary death.  Mago, the Carthaginian general, is routed by Dionysius at Abacanum.  A second peace concluded between Dionysius and the Carthaginian.  Dionysius routs the Carthaginians at Cabala in Sicily, but is beaten by them at Cronion, upon which a peace ensues.  A plague breaks out in Carthage, which lweeps away an infinite number of people. The Africans and Sardirise up in arms, and endeavour to render themselves independent of the Carthaginian state. A particular species of madness seizes many of the inhabitants of Carthage, and produces dismal effects there.  Dionysius advances, with an army of thirty thousand foot, and three thousand horse, into the Carthaginian, son the other hand, enter the port of Exys with two hundred fail, and carry off most of the best Syracusian galleys laid up in that harbour.  Dionysius II. Succeeding his father, comes to an accommodation with the Carthaginians.  Paralus, the Carthaginian governor of Minoa, permits Dion to land five thousand arms there, and supplies him with earthage to convey them to Syracuse, by which means that prince is enabled to proceed in his expedition against Dionysius II.  Timoleon brings succours from Corintb to the Syracusians, and lands his forces in Sicily by a stratagem.  He defeats setas at Advanum, and possessimal prince is enabled to proceed in his expedition against Dionysius II.  Timoleon gives a total overthrow to the Carthaginians and the Romans, in which the inhabitants of Tyre and Utica are comprehended.  Timoleon gives a total overthrow to the Carthaginians and the Romans, in which the inhabitants of Tyre and Utica are comprehended.  Timoleon gives a total overthrow to the Carthaginian forces under Mago, upon the banks of the river Crimesus.  And c		Dionysius takes Motya from the Carthaginians.  Himilco retakes Motya by storm, reduces Messana, and razes it. Mago, the Carthaginian admiral, likewise deseats the Sicilian steet under Leptines. Himilco advances with his army, drawn up in order of battle, to the very walls of Syracuse, and Plunders the temples of Ceres and Proserpina
Mago, the Cartbaginian general, is routed by Dionysius at Abacanum.  A fectord peace concluded between Dionysius and the Carthaginians.  Dionysius routs the Cartbaginians at Cabala in Sicily, but is beaten by them at Cronion, upon which a peace ensues.  A plague breaks out in Cartbage, which tweeps away an infinite number of people. The Africans and Sardirife up in arms, and endeavour to render themselves independent of the Cartbaginian state. A particular species of madness feizes many of the inhabitants of Cartbage, and produces dissual effects there.  Dionysius advances, with an army of thirty thousand foot, and three thousand horse, into the Cartbaginian territories. With this force he son takes Sessimus and Entella, and plunders all the adjacent country. The Cartbaginians, on the other hand, enter the port of Eryx with two hundred fail, and carry off most of the best Syracusians, on the other hand, enter the port of Eryx with two hundred fail, and carry off most of the best Syracusians, on the other hand, enter the port of Eryx with two hundred fail, and carry off most of the best Syracusians, on the other hand, enter the port of Eryx with two hundred fail, and carry off most of the best Syracusians, on the other hand, enter the port of Eryx with two hundred fail, and carry off most of the best Syracusians, on the other hand, enter the port of Eryx with two hundred fail, and carry off most of the best Syracusians, on the other hand, enter the port of Eryx with two hundred fail, and carry off most of the best Syracusians, on the other hands and carriages to convey them to Syracuse.  Paralus, the Cartbaginians.  252 368  367  Paralus, the Cartbaginians of Syracusians, and lands his forces in Sicily by a stratagem.  He defeats Icetas at Adranum, and possessians and the Romans, in which the inhabitants of Tyre and Utica are comprehended.  Timoleon brings succours from Corints to the Cartbaginian forces under Mago, upon the banks of the river Crimesus.  And concludes a peace with that nation.  About this time,	ь	great part of his troops, he is obliged to withdraw. The Africans, to the number of two hundred thousand, seize upon Tunis, and threaten Carthage itself. But samine and divisions oblige them at last to disperse. Himilco, not	495	395
A fecond peace concluded between Dionysius and the Carthaginians.  Dionysius routs the Carthaginians at Cabala in Sicily, but is beaten by them at Cronion, upon which a peace ensues.  A plague breaks out in Carthage, which tweeps away an infinite number of people. The Africans and Sardirise up in arms, and endeavour to render themselves independent of the Carthaginian state. A particular species of madness seizes many of the inhabitants of Carthage, and produces dismal effects there.  Dionysius advances, with an army of thirty thousand foot, and three thousand horse, into the Carthaginian territories.  With this force he soon takes Selinus and Entella, and plunders all the adjacent country. The Carthaginians, on the other hand, enter the port of Eryx with two hundred fail, and carry off most of the best Syracusian galleys laid up in that harbour.  Dionysius II. succeeding his father, comes to an accommodation with the Carthaginians.  Paralus, the Carthaginians governor of Minoa, permits Dion to land five thousand arms there, and supplies him with carriages to convey them to Syracuse, by which means that prince is enabled to proceed in his expedition against Dionysius II.  Simpleon brings succours from Corintb to the Syracusians, and lands his forces in Sicily by a stratagem.  He deseats Letas at Adranum, and possessing to Diodorus.  A second treaty concluded between the Carthaginians and the Romans, in which the inhabitants of Tyre and Utica are comprehended.  Timoleon gives a total overthrow to the Carthaginian forces under Mago, upon the banks of the river Crimesus.  And concludes a peace with that nation.  About this time, in all probability, Hanno forms a design at Carthage to assume the share of the utmost sharing recourse afterwards to arms, and endeavouring to support himself in his rebellion by an alliance with the African princes, he is made an example of the utmost rigour and severity.		Mago, the Carthaginian general, is routed by Dionysius at		395
Dionyfius routs the Caribaginians at Cabala in Sicily, but is beaten by them at Cronion, upon which a peace enfues.  A plague breaks out in Caribage, which tweeps away an infinite number of people. The Africans and Sardirife up in arms, and endeavour to render themselves independent of the Caribaginian state. A particular species of madness seizes many of the inhabitants of Caribage, and produces dismal effects there.  Dionysius advances, with an army of thirty thousand foot, and three thousand horse, into the Caribaginian territories.  With this force he soon takes Selinus and Entella, and plunders all the adjacent country. The Caribaginians, on the other hand, enter the port of Eryx with two hundred fail, and carry off most of the best Syracusian galleys laid up in that harbour.  Dionysius II. Succeeding his father, comes to an accommodation with the Caribaginians.  Paralus, the Caribaginians governor of Minoa, permits Dion to land five thousand arms there, and supplies him with carriages to convey them to Syracuse; by which means that prince is enabled to proceed in his expedition against Dionysius II.  Timoleon brings succours from Corinth to the Syracusians, and lands his forces in Sicily by a stratagem.  He defeats Icetas at Adranum, and possessing succours from Corinth to the Syracusians and the Romans, in which the inhabitants of Tyre and Utica are comprehended.  Timoleon gives a total overthrow to the Cartbaginians and the Romans, in which the inhabitants of Tyre and Utica are comprehended.  Timoleon gives a total overthrow to the Cartbaginian forces under Mago, upon the banks of the river Crimesus.  And concludes a peace with that nation.  About this time, in all probability, Hanno forms a design at Cartbage to assume the sovereignty to himself by destroying the whole body of the fenate. He receives but a slight punishment for the first attempt; but upon his having recourse afterwards to arms, and endeavouring to support himself in his rebellion by an alliance with the African princes, he is made an e		A fecond peace concluded between Dionysius and the Cartha-	498	392 beaten by them at Cronion, upon which a peace enfues.  A plague breaks out in Carthage, which tweeps away an infinite number of people. The Africans and Sardi rife up in arms, and endeavour to render themselves independent of the Carthaginian state. A particular species of madness seizes many of the inhabitants of Carthage, and produces dismal effects there.  Dionysius advances, with an army of thirty thousand foot, and three thousand horse, into the Carthaginian retritories. With this force he soon takes Selinus and Entella, and plunders all the adjacent country. The Carthaginians, on the other hand, enter the port of Eryx with two hundred sail, and carry off most of the best Syracusian galleys laid up in that harbour.  Dionysius II. succeeding his father, comes to an accommodation with the Carthaginians of Minoa, permits Dion to land five thousand arms there, and supplies him with cartiages to convey them to Syracuse, by which means that prince is enabled to proceed in his expedition against Dionysius II.  Timoleon brings succours from Corinth to the Syracustans, and lands his forces in Sicily by a stratagem.  He deseats Icetas at Adramum, and possessing for Syracuse and Messans, in which the inhabitants of Tyre and Utica are comprehended.  Timoleon gives a total overthrow to the Carthaginian forces under Mago, upon the banks of the river Crimosus.  About this time, in all probability, Hanno forms a design at Carthage to assume the sovereignty to himself by destroying the whole body of the senate. He receives but a shaying recourse afterwards to arms, and endeavouring to support himself in his rebellion by an alliance with the African princes, he is made an example of the utmost grigour and severity.	C		499	391
Dionysus advances, with an army of thirty thousand foot, and three thousand horse, into the Carthaginian territories. With this force he soon takes Selinus and Entella, and plunders all the adjacent country. The Carthaginians, on the other hand, enter the port of Eryx with two hundred fail, and carry off most of the best Syracusian galleys laid up in that harbour.  Dionysius II. succeeding his father, comes to an accommodation with the Carthaginians.  Paralus, the Carthaginian governor of Minoa, permits Dion to land five thousand arms there, and supplies him with carriages to convey them to Syracuse; by which means that prince is enabled to proceed in his expedition against Dionysius II.  Timoleon brings succours from Corinth to the Syracusians, and lands his forces in Sicily by a stratagem.  He deseats Icetas at Adranum, and possessing to Diodorus.  A second treaty concluded between the Carthaginians and the Romans, in which the inhabitants of Tyre and Utica are comprehended.  Timoleon gives a total overthrow to the Carthaginian forces under Mago, upon the banks of the river Crimesus.  About this time, in all probability, Hanno forms a design at Carthage to assume the sovereignty to himself by destroying the whole body of the senate. He receives but a slight punishment for the first attempt; but upon his having recourse afterwards to arms, and endeavouring to support himself in his rebellion by an alliance with the African princes, he is made an example of the utmost grigour and severity.		beaten by them at Cronion, upon which a peace ensues. • A plague breaks out in Carthage, which tweeps away an infinite number of people. The Africans and Sardirise up in arms, and endeavour to render themselves independent of the Carthaginian state. A particular species of	508	382 up in that harbour.  Dionysius II. succeeding his father, comes to an accommodation with the Carthaginians.  Paralus, the Carthaginian governor of Minoa, permits Dion to land five thousand arms there, and supplies him with carriages to convey them to Syracuse; by which means that prince is enabled to proceed in his expedition against Dionysius II.  Timoleon brings succours from Corinth to the Syracusians, and lands his forces in Sicily by a stratagem.  He deseats Icetas at Adranum, and possessing the Romans, in which the inhabitants of Tyre and Utica are comprehended.  Timoleon gives a total overthrow to the Carthaginian forces under Mago, upon the banks of the river Crimesus.  About this time, in all probability, Hanno forms a design at Carthage to assume the sovereignty to himself by destroying the whole body of the senate. He receives but a slight punishment for the first attempt; but upon his having recourse afterwards to arms, and endeavouring to support himself in his rebellion by an alliance with the African princes, he is made an example of the utmost general sales.	d	produces dismal effects there.  Dionysius advances, with an army of thirty thousand foot, and three thousand horse, into the Carthaginian territories. With this force he soon takes Selinus and Entella, and plunders all the adjacent country. The Carthaginians, on the other hand, enter the port of Eryx with two hundred	512	373
tion with the Carthaginians.  Paralus, the Carthaginian governor of Minoa, permits Dion to land five thousand arms there, and supplies him with carriages to convey them to Syracuse; by which means that prince is enabled to proceed in his expedition against Dionysius II.  Timoleon brings succours from Corinth to the Syracustians, and lands his forces in Sicily by a stratagem.  He defeats Icetas at Adranum, and possessement of Syracuse and Messan, according to Diodorus.  A fecond treaty concluded between the Carthaginians and the Romans, in which the inhabitants of Tyre and Utica are comprehended.  Timoleon gives a total overthrow to the Carthaginian forces under Mago, upon the banks of the river Crimesus.  And concludes a peace with that nation.  About this time, in all probability, Hanno forms a design at Carthage to assume the sovereignty to himself by destroying the whole body of the senate. He receives but a slight punishment for the first attempt; but upon his having recourse afterwards to arms, and endeavouring to support himself in his rebellion by an alliance with the African princes, he is made an example of the utmost rigour and severity.  523  367  523  367  524  356  344  546  344  547  343  557  343  551  339  551  339  552  338  337		up in that harbour.	522	368
Dionysius II.  Timoleon brings succours from Corinth to the Syracusians, and lands his forces in Sicily by a stratagem.  He deseats Icetas at Adranum, and possesses himself of Syracuse and Messana, according to Diodorus.  A second treaty concluded between the Carthaginians and the Romans, in which the inhabitants of Tyre and Utica are comprehended.  Timoleon gives a total overthrow to the Carthaginian forces under Mago, upon the banks of the river Crimesus.  And concludes a peace with that nation.  About this time, in all probability, Hanno forms a design at Carthage to assume the sovereignty to himself by destroying the whole body of the senate. He receives but a slight punishment for the first attempt; but upon his having recourse afterwards to arms, and endeavouring to support himself in his rebellion by an alliance with the African princes, he is made an example of the utmost rigour and severity.	c	Paralus, the Carthaginian governor of Minoa, permits Dion to land five thousand arms there, and supplies him with carriages to convey them to Syracuse; by which means	523	3 <sup>6</sup> 7
He defeats Icetas at Adranum, and possesses himself of Syracuse and Messana, according to Diodorus.  A second treaty concluded between the Carthaginians and the Romans, in which the inhabitants of Tyre and Utica are comprehended.  Timoleon gives a total overthrow to the Carthaginian forces under Mago, upon the banks of the river Crimesus.  And concludes a peace with that nation.  About this time, in all probability, Hanno forms a design at Carthage to assume the sovereignty to himself by destroying the whole body of the senate. He receives but a slight punishment for the first attempt; but upon his having recourse afterwards to arms, and endeavouring to support himself in his rebellion by an alliance with the African princes, he is made an example of the utmost rigour and severity.  547  343  547  343  551  339  552  338  337		Dionysius II. · · · · · ·	53 4	3 56
A fecond treaty concluded between the Carthaginians and the Romans, in which the inhabitants of Tyre and Utica are comprehended.  I Timoleon gives a total overthrow to the Carthaginian forces under Mago, upon the banks of the river Crimefus.  And concludes a peace with that nation.  About this time, in all probability, Hanno forms a defign at Carthage to assume the sovereignty to himself by destroying the whole body of the senate. He receives but a slight punishment for the first attempt; but upon his having recourse afterwards to arms, and endeavouring to support himself in his rebellion by an alliance with the African princes, he is made an example of the utmost rigour and severity.  547  343  551  339  552  338  337		He defeats Icetas at Adranum, and possesses himself of Syra-	546	344
Timoleon gives a total overthrow to the Carthaginian forces under Mago, upon the banks of the river Crimesus.  And concludes a peace with that nation.  About this time, in all probability, Hanno forms a design at Carthage to assume the sovereignty to himself by destroying the whole body of the senate. He receives but a slight punishment for the first attempt; but upon his having recourse afterwards to arms, and endeavouring to support himself in his rebellion by an alliance with the African princes, he is made an example of the utmost rigour and severity.  551  339  552  338  337		A fecond treaty concluded between the Carthaginians and the Romans, in which the inhabitants of Tyre and Utica	547	343
under Mago, upon the banks of the river Crimesus.  And concludes a peace with that nation.  About this time, in all probability, Hanno forms a design at  Carthage to assume the sovereignty to himself by destroy- ing the whole body of the senate. He receives but a  slight punishment for the first attempt; but upon his having recourse afterwards to arms, and endeavouring to support himself in his rebellion by an alliance with the  African princes, he is made an example of the utmost rigour and severity.  551  339  552  338  337	f	Timoleon gives a total overthrow to the Carthaginian forces	547	343
About this time, in all probability, Hanno forms a defign at  Carthage to assume the sovereignty to himself by destroy- ing the whole body of the senate. He receives but a slight punishment for the first attempt; but upon his having recourse afterwards to arms, and endeavouring to support himself in his rebellion by an alliance with the African princes, he is made an example of the utmost rigour and severity.  554 336				339
having recourse afterwards to arms, and endeavouring to support himself in his rebellion by an alliance with the African princes, he is made an example of the utmost rigour and severity.  554 336		About this time, in all probability, Hanno forms a design at Carthage to assume the sovereignty to himself by destroying the whole body of the senate. He receives but a	5 52	338
354 3,5		having recourse afterwards to arms, and endeavouring to support himself in his rebellion by an alliance with the African princes, he is made an example of the utmost	55 3	337
	g	rigour and severity.	554

	YEAR OF CARTHAGE.	YEAR before	a
Alexander forms the siege of Tyre, upon which the Tyrians	CARTHAGE.	CHRIST.
fend their wives and children to Carthage, where they are kindly received.	559	331
The Carthaginians fend Hamilear, furnamed Rhodanus, as their minister to Alexander at his camp before Tyre; and put him to death on his return home.	559	201
The Cyreneans apply to the Carthaginians for succours against	229	331
a body of Greek mercenaries, that invaded them, but in	_ vain.	5 6 8	322	B
The Carthaginians fend some troops to the assistance of Sosi- stratus, and the Syracusian exiles, against Agathocles.	674	216
They oblige Agathocles to restore the castle of Mylæ to the	57 4	316
Messanians.	576	314
Hamilear routs Agathoeles at Himera, according to Diodorus Siculus.	-0-
Agathocles invades Africa, and gives a memorable defeat there	580	310 to Hanno and Bomilear, the Carthaginian generals, according to Diodorus.	58 t	309
Hamilear is taken by the Syracusians, and has his head struck			C off, which is fent to Agathocles in Africa.  Agathocles prevails upon Ophellas, prince of the Cyreneans, to	582	308
march to his affiftance, and then cuts him off by treachery.	583	307
Bomilear crucified for forming a defign to make himfelf tyrant	5-5	5-7
of Carthage.	583	307
Agathoc'es receives a great defeat from the Carthaginians, and is forced to abandon Africa, which produces a peace between the two powers.	584	306
The articles of the peace figned. • • •	585	30 5
A third treaty concluded betweeen the Romans and the Car-	,		đ thaginians about the time of Pyrrbus's arrival in Italy.  The Carthaginians offer the Romans affistance in their war	610	280 with Pyrrbus, and for that purpose send a sleet of an hundred and twenty fail under the command of Mago; tho'
the Romans decline accepting it.	$\theta_{10}$	280
The Carthaginians beliege Syracuse with an army of fifty thousand men, and a fleet of an hundred sail.	119	278
Pyrrbus makes a descent in Sicily, reduces all the Carthagi-	0.1	-/4 nian towns in that island, except Lilybæum, almost as soon as he appears before them; and loses them again with	613	277	ġ
the same rapidity to the Carthaginians	614	276 reinforce the Mamertine garrison of Messana, and thereby prevents Hiero from possessing himself of that place,		_
which occasions the first Punic war.	625	265
The first Punic war begins. • • • • The Romans, after a siege of seven months, take Agrigentum,	626	264 and gain a victory over the Carthaginian forces under Hanno, fent to its relief	628	262
The conful C. Duilius gains a complete victory over the Cartha-			E ginians by sea, their admiral Hannibal escaping with much difficulty. The other consul Cn. Cornelius Scipio, being surprised, surrenders himself to the enemy under Boodes.	630	260
A drawn naval engagement between the Carthaginians and	6
The Conthaginian receive a great blow by fee from the Ro-	63 3	<sup>2</sup> 5 7
The Carthaginians receive a great blow by fea from the Romans; above thirty of their ships being sunk, and sixty-three taken. Hanno, who had behaved so ill at Agri-gentum, and Hamilear, are their admirals at the time of this disaster. Regulus also lands this year in Africa, reduces		Adis	g
		21((1)	,

2		YEAR of CARTHAGE.	YEAR before CHRIST.
	Adis a strong sortress, and many other places. He gives the Carthaginian army, commanded by Hanno, Bostar, and Hamilear, a most memorable deseat.  The Roman army under Regulus overthrown by Xantippus the Lacedamonian, who, at the desire of the Carthaginian senate,	634	256 takes upon him the command of their forces. Regulus himself is taken prisoner in this action.	635	255
	The Carthaginians become once more masters of the sea.	638	252
Ь	Lilybaum, a Punic town in Sicily, besieged by the Romans.	640	250
	The great Hannibal born.  Hamilear behaves himself with great bravery for three years	642	248 together in Sicily.  The Carthaginians under Hanno are routed by the Romans	645	245 near the island Ægusa or Ægates.  Hamilear, having received full powers from the Carthaginian fenate for that purpose, concludes a peace with the Romans.	648	242
	This puts a period to the first Punic war, after it had lasted
c	four-and-twenty years.  After various turns of fortune, the African or Libyan war is	649	241 brought to a happy conclusion by Hamilear, though the Cartbaginians were reduced to the last extremity through the incapacity of Hanno, and Hannibal, by his indolence, had given a great advantage to the enemy.  Hamilear, being fent by the Carthaginians as their general into	652	238
	Spain, partly by force, and partly by persuasion, subdues nine different nations; but exposing himself too much in a battle with some of the most warlike Spaniards as yet und	conquered, he is stain, and succeeded in his post by Asdrubal.  Asdrubal dies, and is succeeded by Hannibal. That general	661	229 takes Aithwa, the capital of the Olcades; conquers that nation, the Vaccwi, Carpetani, &c. The Saguntines apprise	• the Romans of these proceedings.  The Romans, by their embassadors, expostulate with Hanni-	670	220 bal upon his taking of Saguntum. That general, having fet- tled matters in Spain, makes preparations for a war with the Romans.  This year the fecond Punic war commences, according to Polybius. Hannibal passes the Alps, and defeats Scipio at	671	219
e	Polybius. Hannibal passes the Alps, and defeats Scipio at Ticinum, now called Pavia, after taking Turin, and routing the Gauls, who disputed the passage of the Rhone.  The same general overthrows Sempronius on the banks of the	672	218
	Trebia.  Hanno is defeated in Spain by Scipio, who extends his conquests	. 672	218 as far as the Iberus .  C. Flaminius is overthrown by Hannibal at the lake of Thra-	672	218 fymene, now the Lago di Perugia, with the slaughter of fisteen thousand men. He likewise gives a terrible repulse
f	Scipio deseats Hanno at the town of Cissa in Spain.	673	217
	The Roman army, commanded by Terentius Varro and Amilius Paulus, is totally defeated at Cannæ upon the Aufidus in Apulia. This was the greatest blow the Romans ever received. The Carthaginians in Spain under Astrubal, are overcome by the Romans.  Philip king of Macedon, by his minister Xenophanes, concludes	674	216
	a treaty with Hannibal.	675	215
g	Hannibal takes Tarentum.  Capua besieged by the Romans. The two Scipio's, with their	675 678	212
	Vol. VI. Nº 9. 8 U		armies,

	YEAR OF CARTHAGE.	YEAR before CHRIST.	2
armies, destroyed in Spain by the Carthaginians and their allies.  Hannibal, in order to raise the siege of Capua, bends his march	678	212 towards Rome, and advances within five miles of that capital.  Tarentum retaken by Fabius.  Hannibal, by a stratagem circumventing M. Claudius Mar-	679 681	211 209
cellus and T. Quintius Cri/pinus, cuts off Marcellus, and other Romans of distinction.  Edeco, Indibilis, Mandonius, &c. petty kings or reguli of Spain, join Scipio. By the accession of their forces he is enabled to	682	208	Ь vanquish Asdrubal, the brother of Hannibal, at Bætula, and to drive him out of Spain.  Asdrubal, coming with a powerful army into Italy to join Han-		208
nibal, is overthrown, and his army utterly ruined.  Scipio in Stain vanquishes Afdrubal the son of Gisco, Mago, and Indibilis; draws off Masinissa from the Carthaginian interest;		207 reduces all Spain; and is then recalled to Rome.  Scifio lands in Africa; besieges Utica; burns the camps of Syphax and Afdrubal; overthrows the Carthaginian, Numidian and Celtiberian forces; and takes Tunis. Iiannibal is		206	С obliged to quit Italy , and return to Africa .  An interview between Scipio and Hannibal . The latter of these is intirely deseated at the battle of Zama ; which pro-	687 688	203 202
duces a peace, and terminates the fecond Punic war.  Hannibal, being obliged to leave his native country, lands at Tyre, and afterwards feeks an afylum at the court of An-	_	201
Hannibal dies, according to Livy and Cornelius Negos.  Masinissa, depending on his friendship with Rome, makes an irruption into the province of Tysca, and invades the Car-		195 182 160 or	d thaginian territories.  An embassy is sent from Rome, at the head of which is Cato, to dispose both parties to an accommodation, and determine all differences between them upon the spot. But the Carthaginians reject the mediation of the Romans, tho' they had	731	159 before admitted it; which occasions the third Punic war. A bloody war breaks out between Carthage and Masinissa. The Carthaginians, after the Romans had most perfidiously and inhumanly deprived them of all means of defence, are	732 740 744 Or, accord	158 150 146 ing to Sir Vanc	е commanded to demolish their city; which they not complying with, it is totally destroyed by Æmilianus, and levelled with the ground.	Newton and conjunction 746	d Salmafius, in on with solinus, 146

ton, agree very well in fertiling the ara of Carthage.

Appian tells us in round numbers, that Carthage stood seven hundred years; but Phefius, Soli- Solinus, with greater accuracy, determines its duration to have been seven hundred rus, Sa'mafius, and thirty-seven years, i.e. either so many complete years precisely, or so many sir Isaac New- complete years, with part of another elapsed, which was not reckoned in the computation. Now, if, with Sir Isaac Newton and Salmasius, we suppose this term to have commenced at the encania or dedication of the city, which, they have proved, fell upon the fixteenth year of Pygmalion's reign at Tyre, the beginning of the foundation of Carthage must be placed nine years higher, since Dido came to dfrica in the seventh year of that prince's reign; and consequently this happened seven hundred and fortyfix years before the final destruction of that city by Emilianus. Since therefore Josephus, from Menander Ephesius, or, according to Tatian, Menander of Pergamus, as he is corrected by Petavius, intimates, that Coribage preceded Rome an hundred and forty years, which almost exactly corresponds with Sir Isace Newton and Salmafius; and fince the æra of Petavius, which we have followed, does not differ from that of Solinus, as stated by the two great men above-mentioned, above two years, a g a trifle in a point of so remote antiquity, we may look upon these æra's as the same. This is a strong presumption, that both of them approach very near the truth; and therefore we may venture to affure our readers, that they cannot greatly err, chuse which of them they please '.

THE chronological synopsis here inserted, gives our readers the whole plan of the End of this affairs of Carthage at one view, and, by enabling them to form a general idea of all chronological the principal events that happened to this republic at once, prepares them for the frontis.

perusal of the following history with double advantage (B).

Ir may not be improper to inform our readers, that the first part of this synopsis Authorities depends chiefly upon the authority of Justin and Orosius, compared with Diodorus upon which is Siculus, as the latter does upon that of Diodorus Siculus and Polybius, in conjunction is sounded. b with archbishop Usher. The times of the first transactions of this state it is imposfible to determine to any tolerable degree of exactness; yet, we hope, our determination of them is not very remote from the truth. In afcertaining the years of tho'c of a later date, we have paid no regard to the fentiments of those writers who differ from Diodorus Siculus and Polybius, as being in point of authority vaftly inferior to them k.

<sup>1</sup> Appian in Lybic. Solin. c. 30. Salmas, in Solin. ibid. Newton's chronol. p. 65, 66, &c. Joseph. antiq I. viii. c. 2, 5. l. ix. c. 14. & cont. Apion. I.i. Dion. Petav. dedoct. temp. l. ix. c. 69. Solin. c. 27. Tatian. 2dv. Grac. h Justin. Oros. Diodor. Sic. & Polyb. paffim. Uss. annal. vet. test. paff. Vide etiam Glareant chronol in Liv. per Badium Afcenfium, Parif. ex officin. Mich. Vafcosani, 1543.

(B) We doubt not but the whole learned world will intirely concur with us in our notion of the incomparable archbishop Usher; and, to shew our regard to the memory of to profound a chronologer, we shall endeavour to clear up a point, which he has left a little consuled. That most learned prelate fixes the foundation of Rome, with Fa-bius Pictor, towards the close of the seventh, or beginning of the eighth olympiad; and yet he will have the year of Rome fix hundred and feven (in which Carthage was finally destroyed) to have preceded the christian æra an hundred and forty-fix years. This seems to render him a little inconsistent with himself; for an hundred forty-fix years, added to fix hundred and seven, makes seven hundred and fifty-three years, which, he appears to intimate, was the age of Rome at the birth of Christ. But this feeming inconfiftency will vanish, when we consider, that he all along follows Fabius Pictor, who places the foundation of Rome five years lower than Varro, whom Pliny, Solinus, and most of the Roman authors, follow. This observation will obviate all difficulties that might otherwise occur in some material points, from comparing archbishop Usher with the generality of the Roman chronologers, and thereby pre-vent confusion. The year of Rome, in which the destruction of Carthage happened, according to Fa-bins Pictor, must have been the fix hundred and second, to which add an hundred and forty-fix, and it corresponds, as well as the other, with the christian æra. This is a demonstration of the truth of archbishop Ujher's computation in this particular; and therefore nothing further can be added to it. We think it proper to inform our readers here, that, from the commencement of the olympiads, our numbers perfectly agree with them, and confequently are not repugnant either to the Varronian or Failan accounts, the, with a chbiftop Uper, we are of opinion, that the latter points out the true epoch of Rome. It must not be forgot, that we were mistaken in the Roman history, vol. iv. p. 425 l. 8, 9, 10. when we made archbishop Upher to prefer Varro's opinion to that of Fabius; and yet at the fame time observed, that the archbishop places the birth of Christ seven hundred and forty-eight years distant from the foundation of Rome, in direct agreement with Fabius. What led us to that milfake, was a passage in him, wherein he seems to fo'low Varro; but, upon a second peruial of that passage, we are fully convinced, that he there only gives us what, he conceived, was Pliny's opinion. We must likewise beg our readers to correct the word eighty. nine in the beginning of l. 19. p. 659. vol. vi. which ought to be ninety-two (2).

(2) Fac. Uff. annal. par. post. ad ann. Jul. period. 4568. p. 87. & annal. ves. sest. ad ann. Jul. period. 3966. p. 87. edit. Lond. 1650, & 1654.

SECT. V.

The history of the Carthaginians, from the foundation of their city, to the first Punic war.

c ELISA, known also by the name of Dido, fled from Tyre in the seventh year of the Cause of Elisa's reign of Pygmalion king of that city. Her flight is faid to have been occasioned departure from by the cruel and insatiable avarice of Pygmalion, who was her brother. This prince, in order to secure to himself the immense treasures of his uncle Sichaus, who had married his fifter Dido, was the priest of Hercules, and, by virtue of that post, the second person in the kingdom, sound means to destroy him. The manner in which this was effected, is differently related: Virgil will have it, that Pygmalion barbarously murdered his uncle at the altar; but Eustathius and Cedrenus intimate, that he dispatched him at a hunting-match, and then throwing him down a precipice, gave out, that the a fall had been the occasion of his death. However, as Sichaus was well acquainted with the fordid and avaricious temper of his nephew, he had, by way of precaution, buried his riches under ground; which, with the prudent and artful conduct of Elisa, rendered abortive the tyrant's design. Sichæus, appearing to his disconsolate widow in a dream, apprifed her of his tragical exit, and advised her to fly immediately, in order to avoid the same sate. Upon this she determined to make her escape, and carry off those treasures, which had prompted her brother to so inhuman an action; but, in order to this, she judged it proper for some time to amuse him, which she did, by diffembling her refentment, and keeping up the appearance of an affection for him, till an opportunity offered of affembling her friends, and concerting with b them the proper measures for speedily abandoning Tyre. The principal of these were her brother Barea, and several senators, who, hating Pygmalion, and apprehending themselves every moment in danger of being sacrificed by a prince, who had broken through all the ties of nature and humanity, engaged to follow her at all adventures. To execute the defign she had formed the more effectually, she applied to the king for vessels to carry her, Barca, and their effects, to Charica or Charlaca, a maritime town in his dominions, under the pretext of reliding there. To this Pygmalion readily agreed, as imagining, that by such a step he should become master of what had so long been the object of his most ardent desires. Elisa, being thus supplied with men and ships, weighed anchor; and being got into the ocean at a proper c distance from Tyre, commanded her men to throw into the sea some bags filled with fand, which, she told them, contained the wealth of her husband Sichaus, and, in a doleful tone, intreated his manes to accept of those riches as an oblation, which had been the cause of his destruction. Then, addressing herself to her companions, she gave them to understand, that there was nothing terrible they might not fear from the tyrant's refentment, for being instrumental in defeating his avaricious purposes, if ever they fell into his hands; by which means having fixed them more firmly in her interest, she pursued her voyage, and got out of her brother's reach, before he was apprifed of her refolution a.

Pyamilion prevented from puruing Elita.

Pygmalion, finding all his hopes thus defeated by his fifter's fubtlety, and being d grieved, that those treasures should be fnatched from him in a moment, which he thought himself so sure of, and which he had so long enjoyed in imagination, gave orders to fit out a fleet with all possible expedition, in order to pursue the sugitives; but he was diverted from this design by the intreaties of his mother, and the menaces of the inspired college of vates, who threatened him with the indignation of the gods, if he offered to obstruct in any manner the grand project Elisa was gone upon b.

Flifa touched

THE first place our heroine touched at was some port in the island of Cyprus, pospirfi at Cyptus. fibly Salamis, which was then in its infancy; fince, according to Virgil and Servius, in conjunction with the Arundelian marbles, Teucer, and Mettinus, Elisa's father, seized upon Cyprus, or at least a part of it, not very long before, when the former of these built Salamis. Here she met with a priest of Jupiter, who offered to attend her with his whole family, and partake of her future fortune; which she readily accepted of. As this motion of the priest proceeded from an impulse, or rather command, of the deity himself, she looked upon it as a good omen, and settled the priesthood of Jupiter in that family .

Cyprian women proflitute them elves for dowries.

It was a prevailing custom in this island at the time of Elisa's arrival, for the maids to go on certain stated days, before marriage, to the sea-side, there to look for strangers that might possibly arrive on their coasts, in order to prostitute themselves for gain, and thereby acquire a dowry. Out of these the Tyrians selected a certain number, Justin says eighty; and carrying them on board, found them very subser- f vient to their delign of planting a new colony d.

JUSTIN, l. XVIII. TACIT. annal. XVI. TERTUL. in Pal. SIL. ITAL. l. i. APPIAN. in Lib. sub init. Eustynh. in Dionys. Afr. ut & ipse Dionys. Herodian. l. v. Liv. l. XXXIV. Vel. Paterc. l. i. Virgua An. i. & iv. Serv. in Virg. An. i. & iv. Georg. Cedren. hist. compend. p. 140. edit. Par. 1647. Joseph. antiq. l. viii. c. 13. cont. Apion. l. i. Solin. c. 30. & 27. edit. Salm. Vide & Salian. & Torniel. in annal. Petav. de doct. temp. l. ix. c. 63. & rationar. temp. par. ii. l. ii. c. 13. Tatian. cont. Grac. Theophil. Antiochen. apud Autoly l. iii. Tertul. apol. Clem. Alex. Strabo, l. XVIII. Plin. l. v. AMMIAN. MARCEL. PLUTARCH. EUTROP. FLOR. OROS. ZONAR. REINECC. hist. Jul. vol. i. & ii. Hendr. de rep. Carth. l. i. sect. i. c. 1. b Justin. l. xviii. e Idem ibid. Virg. Æn. i. Serv. in loc. Apollodor. Newton's chronol. p. 65. d Justin. ubi supre.

From hence they steered their course for the coasts of Africa, and at last happily She lands in landed in the province called afterwards Africa Propria, not far from Utica, a Tyrian Atrica. colony, and city of great antiquity; which we have already described. The inhabitants received their countrymen with all possible demonstrations of joy, and giving them a most kind reception, advised them to build a city upon that spot, to which the fates had conducted them .

IT was Elifa's first care, upon her arrival, to cultivate a good understanding with Cultivates a the natives, to which they were by no means, for any confiderable time, averie, on good underaccount of the advantages they perceived would naturally flow to them from an esta-the natives. blished commerce and harmony betwixt the two nations. She then purchased a track of land of them, for her and her wearied Tyrians to settle upon. Justin, Appian, b Virgil, Eustathius, Themistius, &c. intimate, that the Phanicians imposed upon the Africans, when a bargain was made betwixt them, in the following manner: They defired for their intended fettlement only fo much ground as an ox's hide would encompass. This request the Africans at first laughed at; but were surprised, when, upon their granting it, they found Elisa cut the hide into the smallest shreds, and with them surrounded a large extent of territory, on which she built a citadel, from this incident called Býrsa. The learned however unanimously agree in exploding this fable, which feems to owe its origin either to the envy and malice of the Romans, or the vanity of the Greeks, who ridiculously affected to deduce every thing that savoured the natives; which may possibly be true, since it is certain an annual tribute for the ground the Tyrians possessed was, by their first agreement with the Africans, exacted from them, which they were obliged to pay for many years after f.

of high antiquity from their own nation or language, though never fo remote from Appian seems to infinuate, that at first Elija met with some opposition from

THE neighbouring people, at first invited by the prospect of lucre, and with this Either builds a view repairing to the Phanician settlement to sell these foreigners the necessaries of new city there, life, in a short time incorporated themselves with them. These inhabitants soon old one. growing very numerous, Elifa followed the advice of the Utican embassadors, who were fent to congratulate her upon her happy arrival in the name of their state; and built a new city, or at least much inlarged the old one, which could make no very d considerable figure before. As the natives of the country, or Aborigines, were of the fame fentiments with the Uticans in this particular, and, as may reasonably be prefurned, gave the Tyrians all necessary assistance, both in the building their city, and peopling it afterwards, Carthage soon became a place of great same, and demanded the respect of all its neighbours g.

We are told by Justin, that, in digging for the foundations of the city, the work- A horse's head men first found an ox's head, which was indeed a symbol of fertility of soil, but at found whilst the same time presaged continual toil, and perpetual servitude, to the city. Upon this the Tyrians they removed to another spot, where, in digging, they discovered a horse's head, for the soundawhich they interpreted as a happier omen, portending the future martial genius of the tions of Case inhabitants. Eustathius adds, that the horse's head had a palm-tree, or at least a thagebranch of palm, discovered with it; which they considered, without doubt, as an emblem of victory. This determined Elisa to fix upon that spot for the situation of her city; and in allusion to this it was, that the Carthaginians had, in after-ages, a horse's head, or a horse and a palm-tree, so frequently upon the reverses of their coins h (C).

THE principal names of Carthage have already been given in the first section of the Different history we are now upon. However, it may not be improper to remark, that the names of Car-Carthaginians are sometimes called Sidonians, and their city Tyre, by antient authors. thage. Eusebius seems to affirm, that its most antient name was Origo; but as Carthage and e Idem ibid. f Justin. l. xviii. Virg. Æn. i. Eustath. in Dionys. Afr. Appian. in Lib. sub init. Themist. orat. xxi. p. 260, 261. Serv. in Æn. i. Liv. l. xxxiv. Dionys. in perieg. Justin. l. xix. Sil. Ital. l. i. Vide Voss. th gent. l. i. c. 32. Bochart. Chan. &c. & Virg. Serv. & Justin. ubi sup. b Virg. & Justin. ubi sup. Isidor. l. xv. c. 2. & l. ix. c. 2. Eustath. in Dionys. Afr. Steph. Byzant. deurb. Anton. Augustin. dial. ant. 6. Suid. Cæl. Rhodigin. ant. lect. l. xviii. c. 38. & Boch. Chan. l. i.

(C) Some of these coins, particularly of the filver and gold ones, are of exquilite workmanship, nothing at all inferior to any of the Greek or Roman. They are found in the kingdoms of Tunis and Algiers, in those parts of Spain the Carthaginians first possessed, and in Sicily. Numbers of them may be seen in Aldrete, Paruta, Haym, and the cabinets of the curious.

its foundress are both mentioned in that passage; and as her name, Elisa (D) or Elissa, a imports the same thing in Hebrew or Phanician as Virago in Latin, Bochart takes the word Open or Origo to be a corruption of Outpays or Virago; and consequently supposes it to refer not to Carthage, but to Elisa or Dido. As Servius afferts, though falfly, Dido in Punic to have answered to Virago in Latin, and it is very possible Eufebius might have been imposed upon by this mistake, we cannot help declaring ourfelves intirely of Bochart's opinion. It is likewise denominated by Stephanus Oenusa, or Oenussa; by Eustathius, Cadmea; and by Suidas, Aphrice. According to some, the name Tarshish in scripture sometimes denotes Carthage; in one passage particularly this word feems to plainly to point at that city, that it is rendered by the vulgate version Carthago. Theodoret and others countenance this notion i.

Dido sought in marriage by Iarbas, a neighbouring trince.

EVERY thing thus conspiring with Elisa's views, and succeeding according to her defire, by the coalition of different nations, the new city, in a short time, grew wealthy and flourishing; which agreeable situation tempted Iarbas, a neighbouring prince, to endeavour at making himself master of it without any essusion of blood. In order to which he defired, that an embasily of ten of the most noble Carthaginians might be fent him; which having obtained, he proposed to them a marriage with Elija or Dido, for that, in all probability, was the name she went by after her departure from her native country, threatening them with a war, in case of a resusal. The embassadors, being afraid to deliver the message, told their sovereign with Punic fubtlety, that Iarbas defired some person might be sent him, who was capable of c civilizing and polishing himself and his dfricans; but that there was no possibility of finding any of her subjects, who would leave his relations for the conversation of barbarians, who were as favage as the wildest beasts. Here being reprimanded by the queen, she asked them, if they were not ashamed to refuse living in any manner, which might be beneficial to their country, to which they owed their very lives? They then opened to her the king's commands, adding, that, according to her own decision of the point, and to set her subjects a good example, she ought to sacrifice herself to her country's welfare. Being thus ensnared, she called upon her husband Sichaus with tears and lamentations, and at last answered, that she would go where her own fate, and that of her city, called her. In the mean time she caused a pile d to be erected in the farthest part of the city; and at the expiration of three months, which time she required for the execution of her design, killing many victims, as tho she intended to sacrifice to, and appeale the manes of her first husband before her second marriage, she ascended it. Then looking all around her upon the spectators, she told them, she was going to her husband, as they had ordered her; and immediately, with a dagger she had taken with her for that purpose, put a period to her days k.

Justin and Virgil's account of the death of that princess, which, we need not tell our readers, is different from Virgil's. Gedrenus and Sir Isaac Newton savour Virgil's notion, their opicion of though they do not in all points agree with him. The former of these relates, that Eneas the Phrygian, after the destruction of Troy, came to Africa, and resided some time with Dido there; but perceiving Iarbas, king of the Numidians, the Mauritanians, the Massili or the Gatulians, to take umbrage at this, he thought proper to retire, as dreading the effects of his power and refentment. This passage of Cedrenus, whom we take to have been a very good compiler and collector of antient history, seems greatly to support Sir Isaac Newton's opinion, in relation to Eneas and Dido's being cotemporaries, and likewise to evince a most material point, viz. that Virgil, and Tro-

> VIRG. & SIL. ITAL past. SAL. de bell. Jugurth. Tibul. l. iv. ver. 137. Ovid. ep. her. D. August. de unit. eccles. Ezek. xxvii. 12. Thedoret. Hieronym. Euseb. in chron. Boch. in prefat. Phal. & k Justin. ubi sup. Chan. l. i.

(D) According to the author of the etymologicon magnum, Elisa or Elissa was the first name of this princess, which, as Bochart shews, may either be interpreted divina virgo, or, with the Arabic article prefixed, virago, xal eξοχίν. Phavorinus, in conjunction with the author of the etymologicon aforesaid, will have the name Dido to have been given her after her arrival in Africa, 2s importing the traveller, or wanderer, to which Bochart agrees. Eustathius absurdly says, Dido signifies a murderer of a husband; whereas Elisa or Elissa will admit of fuch an interpretation: and Servins, with as much impropriety, translates Dido virago, the undoubted fignification of Elifa or Eliffa. Many more conjectures about these words may be seen in Bochart and Volfius, which it is not worth while to recite (3).

<sup>(3)</sup> Bochart. Chan. l. i. c. 24. & l. ii. c. 24. Enfluth. in Dlonyf. Afr. Voff. idol. gent. l. i. c. 32. Serv. in An. Reinec. in hift. Jul. t. 1, 2.

a gus, whom Justin epitomized, agree in their chronology. What Sir Isaac Newton advances concerning Dido's father Mettinus and Teucer's seizing upon Cyprus about the time of the Trojan war, renders Virgil's chronology likewise more probable, than the generality of learned men are willing to allow. But this we shall just touch upon immediately 1.

How long Dido reigned at Carthage, or when the came to the violent death above-Dido's characmentioned, we cannot take upon us to determine. What feems to be the best sup-ter. ported by antient history is, that her brother Barca and fister Anna attended her from Tyre to Africa; and that, by their committing every thing to her management and direction, it should seem she was a woman of an uncommon genius. This likewise b appears from the artful manner in which the imposed upon her brother Pygmalionbefore her departure from Tyre, when, under the pretence of diverting her melancholy on account of her husband's death, which, she infinuated, Cartbage could not fail of perpetuating, she had the address to persuade him, that her intention really was to retire to, and reside at, Chartaca. The secrecy and prudence with which her grand enterprize was conducted, as well as the cunning device by which she fixed even Pygmalion's men in her interest, above recited, indisputably evince the same thing. That she was a lady of most attractive charms, as well as a rare pattern of chastity, is attested by the best authors ".

Macrobius tells us, that Virgil's relation of Dido's amours with Aneas, and of her Mecrobius ine laying violent hands on herself at his departure from Africa, after he had debauched co-stillent with her, was universally esteemed as sabulous in his age. This indeed we disbelieve, but bimself in relation to Dido's not upon Macrobius's authority; for that author is inconsistent with himself in respect character. to Dido's character. In one place he celebrates her temperance and chaftity, which is exactly agreeable to the faith of history; whereas in another he makes her guilty of the greatest intemperance, luxury and profusion at her entertainments; which, in our opinion, deserves no credit at all, as being not only contrary to the general character of our princess, but likewise to the Carthaginian genius, as has been above observed. Virgil, as a Roman, we believe, in this particular did not pay the greatest regard to truth, the antipathy betwixt his nation and the Carthaginians not permitting d it; but notwithstanding this, we cannot help imagining his chronology to be something nearer the truth than is generally supposed, and that for the reasons hinted above, as well as for the following one, which to us feems fomething cogent, and which therefore we beg leave to transcribe from the excellent Sir Isaac Newton: " The Pha-" nicians, after the death of Melcartus, says this incomparable author, built a temple to him in the island Gades, and adorned it with the sculptures of the labours of "Hercules, and of his bydra, and the horses, to whom he threw Diomedes, king of the Bistones in Thrace, to be devoured. In this temple was the golden belt of Teucer, and the golden olive of Pygmalion, bearing smaragdine fruit; and by these consecrated gifts of Teucer and Pygmalion you may know, that it was built in their e "days." If these facts, and the reasoning built upon them, be admitted, it will follow, that Teucer and Pygmalion were cotemporaries, and consequently that Eneas and Dido might be fo. Now, though we cannot pretend to affert, that this argument is demonstrative, because there is no absolute necessity to suppose, that all these ornaments were brought into the temple at once, yet, considering what we have before offered from Sir Isaac Newton, Apollodorus, Servius, and the marbles, in proof of Teucer and Mettinus's being jointly concerned in the conquest of Cyprus, we cannot look upon it as void of a tolerable degree of probability ".

How long monarchical government prevailed at Carthage, or what accidents befel A chasm in the this state in its infancy, or even what transactions it was concerned in for several ages bissory of Carat first, we cannot inform our readers, since there is a chasm in the Carthaginian those for history for above three hundred years after the tragical end of Dido. In general hundred years. Justin, and he alone, gives us to understand, that Carthage was much agitated by civil diffentions, and haraffed with the plague during part of this period. It likewise appears from Diodorus Siculus and Polybius, that this republic had got a strong footing in Sicily and Sardinia, and made confiderable acquisitions elsewhere, before the date of any of those transactions it bore a part in, the knowledge of which has reached us. Thucydides and Herodotus moreover put it beyond dispute, that it was very formidable formidable by jea in the time of Cyrus and Cambyfes.

<sup>1</sup> CEDREN. ubi supra. Newton's chronol. p. 65, 66, &c. m Reinec. hist. Jul. t. 1. SIL. ITALIC. п Масков. faturn. l. v. c. 17. & l. vii. с. 1. JUST. ubi Supra. TERTULLIAN. MACROB. AUSON. &C. PHILOSTRAT. in vit. Apollon l. v. c. 1. apud Phot. NEWTON'S chronol. p. 112, 113, &c.

Carthage very by sea even in the time of Cyrus and Cambyses, and that it must have performed many a brave exploits upon that element even before the reigns of those puissant monarchs. But this is not to be wondered at, it not being possible for any nation endued with fuch a genius, and possessed of so much power, as the Carthaginians must have been famous for in very early ages, to have long remained in a state of inaction, either by A flourishing state of commerce naturally begets riches, and riches power; and, confidering that ambition is a darling passion in the minds of great men, and almost inseparable from power, and that war, for the most part, is the effect of ambition, it cannot well be doubted, but that our republic made many expeditions against, and incursions into, the territories of its neighbours, long before the beginning of, what may be termed with respect to us, the Carthaginian historical b period of time. Had the writings of Philistus Syracusanus, Ephorus, Timæus Siculus, Aratus, Trogus Pompeius, the fixth, seventh, eighth, ninth and tenth books of Diodorus Siculus, or any of the Punic historians, been now extant, we might have received sufficient light from them in many material points relating to the first ages of Carthage; but all these have, for a long series of generations, been no more. The Punic archives would also most certainly have set us right in all particulars of moment relating to the history we are now upon, had they been in being; but these the ROMAN virtue, generofity, greatness of foul, and love of truth, thought proper to deny posterity, lest they should bave given their minds a wrong bias, and been prejudicial to the cause of truth. We are therefore obliged, tho' with great regret, to pass over the transactions of the Cartha- c ginian state during the chasm aforesaid, as buried in oblivion, and proceed to continue this work in the best manner we can from those pieces and fragments of antiquity, that, through the injuries of time, have been handed down to us.

The Carthaginians, in conjunction with defeated in a Phocæans.

We have just hinted, that the Carthaginians were very powerful by sea in the time of Cyrus and his fon Cambyses, not to say much earlier. This appears from feveral confiderations, particularly from a naval engagement that happened between the united fleets of the Carthaginians and Etruscans and that of the Phocaens, one of the most formidable nations in the world by sea in Cyrus's reign, wherein tho' the Phofea-fight by the coans got the victory, yet their whole fleet was either funk or disabled; insomuch that they durst not venture a second engagement, but abandoned the island of Cyr- d nus, now Corsica, to the Carthaginians and Etruscans. The Phocaans retired to Rhegium, and soon after to Enotria, now Ponza, a small island in the Tyrrbenian or Etruscan sea, over against Velia in Lucania, which their ancestors had first peopled; and the Carthaginians, with the Etruscans, took quiet possession of Cyrnus. Herodotus and Thucydides both take notice of this sea fight, as one of the most antient to be met with in history. The Carthaginian and Etruscan united fleets confisted of an hundred and twenty fail, the most active part of which, we may suppose, was the Carthaginian, fince the Etruscans at that time did not make so great a figure by sea; and the Phocean of fixty. Herodotus feems to fneer the Phoceans upon their victory, as being, in a manner, ruined by it. According to Thucydides, the Phocaens built Massilia, e now Marseilles, some time near this period o.

Towards the conclusion of Cyrus's reign, or that of his uncle Cyaxeres the second, as we have stated it, the Carthaginians carried on a war with the neighbouring African princes, wherein they obtained great advantages, which, according to Justin, were chiefly owing to the conduct and bravery of their general Macheus (E). after the conclusion of this war, they sent a great body of forces, with a powerful fleet, to Sicily, under the command of the same general, who reduced a good part of that god part of the island to their obedience. But notwithstanding the happy situation of their affairs island of Sicily abroad, the author above-mentioned infinuates, that they were much agitated by f civil dissentions at home, and afflicted with other evils, of which the pestilence, that then made dreadful havock at Carthage, seems to have been the most terrible. This they attributed to the anger of the gods, and endeavoured to appeale them with human facrifices; nay, in order to render them more propitious to their city, they

· Неворот. l. i. Тнисур. l. i. fub init.

(É) This general's name, in some manuscripts of Justin, is Maleus, in others Machaus or Macheus. Orofius calls him Mazeus; and Gravius, Malchus. Vossus likewise seems to prefer the last to the others; but offers no folid argument for this preference.

We beg leave therefore to follow Reineccius, Ubbo Emmius, and Hendreich, who chuse Machaus, notwithstanding many of our late editions of Justin have Maleus.

fcrupled'

a scrupled not to offer up their children themselves on this melancholy occasion. This detestable practice, so contrary to the dictates of humanity, and all the tender impulses of nature, instead of producing the desired effect, incensed the gods still more Incense the gods against them. In consequence of which, according to Justin's observation, their arms by sacrificing were attended afterwards with ill success, though they had before been so fortunate them. in Sicily (which, by the way, proves their fettlement in that island to have been coeval with, if not prior to, the beginning of the Persian empire) for, immediately after the conclusion of the Sicilian war, transporting their forces into the island of Sardinia, they intended nothing less than making an absolute conquest of it; but the displeasure of the gods now pursuing them, they received a notable deseat here from b the Sardi, in which above half of their army was cut off. Enraged at fo many disasters, instead of endeavouring to discover the true cause of them, they banished Banish their their general Machaus, with the remainder of the army under his command. That general Macommander, covered with glory and victory before the last unhappy expedition to chaus, Sardinia, could not but highly refent fuch ungrateful as well as inhuman treatment, especially as, by his conduct and bravery, he had reduced a great part of the island of Sicily to the obedience of the Carthaginians, and greatly extended their frontiers in Africa. First therefore he sends to Carthage in an amicable manner, begging the senate not to impute to him, and the troops, the misfortunes that had befallen them, but to permit them to return home quietly; adding withal, that, in case of a resusal, they would do themselves justice by force of arms. But neither this friendly remonstrance, nor the menace annexed to it, making any impression on the senate, after waiting in vain some days for an answer, they went on board their ships, and advanced with great expedition towards the city. As foon as they had invested it, they appealed to Who befieges the gods above for the purity of their intentions, and declared in the presence of gods Carthage, and men, that their defign was not to hurt their fellow-citizens, but only to demonstrate to them what wrong sentiments they had entertained of their valour, when they attributed the loss above-mentioned to a want of bravery in the troops; whereas it ought to be ascribed to the caprice of fortune. This not availing, after they had cut off all communication betwixt the city and the continent, they besieged it in form, and soon reduced it to the last extremity for want of provisions. The Carthaginians, involved in these deplorable circumstances, began now to reslect upon their past folly and ingratitude; but how to extricate themselves out of their present difficulties, was the grand question. In the mean time Cartalo, the general's son, arrived in the city from Tyre, and, had matters taken a right turn, might have had a conference with his father, and possibly have disposed him to an accommodation. This Cartalo had been fent by his countrymen to Tyre, with the tenths of an immense quantity of plunder taken by his father in Sicily, intended as a donation or offering to the Tyrian Hercules; and passing by the camp in his return home, was ordered by his father to come to him immediately; but this command, for the present, he refused complying with, e under pretence, that he must perform the public offices of religion, before he could give an instance of filial duty. Machaus was far from being pleased with this answer; however, for the present he took care to conceal his resentment, as not daring to do any thing that might look like the least violence offered to religion. Soon after this incident, having obtained leave for that purpose, he came out of the city to the camp, dressed in his pontifical robes; for he was, as it should seem, the priest of Hercules. His father, far from being struck with such a pompous appearance, taking him in private, addressed himself to him in the following terms: " Hast thou the assurance, " most abandoned wretch, to appear in this rich and splendid habit before so many " miserable citizens, and a camp overwhelmed with woe? What mean these ensigns " of peace and felicity at this juncture, but to infult all of us? Was there no other " place for thee to display thy pride and haughtiness in, but this spot of ground, " which is the scene of thy father's misery and disgrace? How came you so lately " to despise, with such an insolent air, the command, I will not say of your father, " but of your general? And what are these gorgeous robes but the fruit of my " victories? Since therefore you have confidered me not as a father, but an exile, " I, in return, will behave to you not as a father, but a general." And he was as good as his word; for immediately ordering a high cross to be erected, he had him crucified thereon in his facred vestments, in the sight of all the citizens. Some days And crucifies after, the city furrendered; when convening the fenate and people, he complained of his son Cartalo.

g the injury and indignity offered him, and excused the hostile manner in which he had The city surrenter.

Vol. VI. No 10.

8 Y

behaved

behaved towards them, as not being the effect of choice, but necessity. He, for the a present, made no alterations in the established form of government; but contented himself with putting to death ten of the senators, by whose advice the late violent resolutions against him and the army had been taken o (F).

ALL

O Justin. & Oros. ubi supra.

(F) In this note we shall endeavour to give some account of crucifixion, which was a capital punishment used amongst the Syrians, Egyptians, Persians, fews, Africans, Greeks, and Romans. According to Fagius, it was not at first in use amongst the Jews; and indeed this appears from the law of Moses it-felf. The learned Casaubon concurs with him herein, though Baronius and Lipsius maintain the contrary opinion. Sigonias confounds this with hanging or suspension, as does father Calmet in many instances, particularly those of the worshippers of Baal-peor, and the king of Ai, who were hung up The Talmudists refer it to stoning or lapidation. There were three different forts of crosses erected for the execution of malefactors. The first was the crux decussata, in the form of the letter X, as St. Andrew's cross is pictured. The second the crux commissa, like the letter T. The third the crux immissa, when one piece of wood was transversely fattened to another in fuch a manner, as to cut it at right angles at some distance from the top, so +. Such, according to antient medals, and the tradition of the christian church in all ages, was our bleffed Saviour's cross. Crucifixion was the punishment appointed for slaves, and the scum of the people, when guilty of the most enormous crimes, and was therefore called fervile supplicium; the freemen, or persons of distinction, in such cases, falling by the ax or fword. The criminals, before execution, were taken either from home or the prætorium amongst the Romans, and scourged in a most cruel manner. Sometimes they were tied to the cross, as we find our bleffed Saviour was, and always obliged to carry it, or part of it. When they arrived at the place of execution, they were stripped naked, and nailed to the cross, either lying on the ground, or erect. Their hands and feet were first tied to it with cords, and afterwards nailed with three or four nails, as the executioner pleased, beginning with the right hand or foot, and proceeding from thence to the left. Upon the piece of wood rising above the arms of the cross an inferior was a first the cross an inferior was a first the cross an inferior was a first the cross an inferior was a first the cross an inferior was a first the cross an inferior was a first the cross an inferior was a first the cross an inferior was a first the cross and the cross and the cross a first the cross and the cross an the cross, an inscription was posted, specifying the crime for which the malefactor fuffered, though fometimes, instead of this, the crier proclaimed it to the spectators attending the execution. In Judea, the thighs of the malefactors were broken, in case they were not dead by fun-fet; because the Fews, by their law, were obliged to take them from the cross at that time, which the Romans, their governors, permitted them to do. By the Roman laws, the bodies remained on the crofs, till they were intirely consumed, as our notorious offenders do now upon gibbets; nevertheless the judge, or supreme magistrate, had the power of giving the bodies to friends or relations, in order to be interred. On the emperor's birth-day, or fuch-like festivals, they were frequently taken down from the cross, and buried, without the intercession of friends. The Jews constantly buried the bodies of crucified malefactors, in conformity to their law, though the pagans left them exposed on the cross as aforesaid. According to some authors, the patibulum, or gallows, and the antient cross, were the fame, though Isidorus makes them different. He calls the transverse piece of wood patibulum, and the crect one stipes and crux. Afterwards patibulum and furca, the gallows, were the fame, and the punishment on them was looked upon as much milder, and less ignominious, than that on the crofs; for on the gallows the crimina's foon expired, whereas on the cross they continued a long time in torture. Sometimes offenders fuffered death on the cross with their heads downwards, as St. Peter; and iometimes with their thighs as well as arms expanded, in like manner as St. Andrew is supposed to have been crucified. The crosses were made of the hardest wood, frequently of oak, as some believe our Saviour's was. The places of execution were either near the public roads and highways, or on the top of some mountain or eminence, that the bodies might be feen by all people, and thereby a terror struck into them. If the crux and patibulum were originally the fame, crucifixion prevailed at Rome in the time of the kings. The perfons condemned to be crucified, or deserving it, were called by the Romans cruciarii. To be crucified was a mark of great infamy to foldiers, officers and men of quality. This punishment was so com-mon amongst the Romans in the times of the republic, and afterwards, that pains, afflictions, troubles, and unprosperous affairs, were called crosses, and the verb cruciare frequently denoted the infliction of all forts of chastisements, and pains of body and mind.

Friends and relations generally attended the execution, in order to beg the bodies of the fupreme magistrate or commanding officer, at least in Judea. When this did not happen, parties of foldiers were posted near them, to prevent their being carried off. Constantine abolished crucifixion, thinking enormous villains, and persons guilty of the most stagant crimes, unworthy of suffering death in the same manner our blessed Saviour did, and introduced hanging in its stead. The Jews did not permit the relations of the persons executed to piace their kinstemen in the tombs belonging to their samilies, till their stess then they were allowed to remove their bones into private sepulchres. It was perhaps for this reason, that Joseph of Arimathea desired leave from Pilate to lodge the body of Jesus in his own tomb, that he might not be thrown into the public burying-place appointed for criminals (6).

The Caribaginians, contrary to the practice of other nations, crucified their nobility, suffects, and even the generals of their armies themselves, however absolute they might be in the field, if their enterprizes were not attended with success. The crosses of malefactors amongst them seem to have been higher or lower, in proportion to the quality of the persons suffering, and the heinousness of the crime for which they suffered. If any notorious offender of distinction escaped justice in his life-time, his body, after death, was exposed on a cross, in order to deter others from committing the same crime, especially when it merited the most severe and ig-

(6) Paulus Fagius ad Deut, XXI. XXII. Cafaub, exerc, XVI, num, 77. Baron, in annal. Just. Lits de cruc. Sigon, de rep. Hebraor, l. vi. c. 8. Liv. & Senec, pass. Lucian, Plut, Plant, Petron, in satyric, pass. April. de asin, aur. l. iii. Joseph, l. v. c. 32. B. Gerhardi harmon, evang, hist, pass. Christ. c. 19. Philo in Fiac. Cic. 5. in Ver. & Tusc. quast. Jo. And. Quenstedius de sepult, vet. c. 3. Durand variar, l. ii. c. 15. Cerda in adversar. Isidor, l. i. Gretser, & Joseph. Laurent, de torment, c. 7. Aur. Vict. in Constant, Sozom, in bist, eccles. Vide & alios quamplurimos apud Calmer, in dict. bibl. sub voc. croix.

ALL things in Carthage being thus fet upon the antient foot, the republic enjoyed fome repose. But this was not of long continuance; for Machaus, pussed up with He endeavours the late advantages he had gained, endeavoured to subvert the constitution, and to introduce arintroduce arbitrary power. But his pernicious views being happily discovered, his but his design scheme was deseated, and he received the punishment due to so great a crime; upon being discoverwhich event Justin makes this reflection; "He was justly rewarded for the cruelty ed, he receives " he had been guilty of both to his fon and his country P."

WE are told by Herodotus, that Cambyses, in the fixth year of his reign, resolved ment. upon an expedition against the Carthaginians; but that he was forced to drop his project, by reason the Phanicians, without whose help he could not carry on that The Phanicians b war, refused to assist him therein, because the Carthaginians were their descendants. ans resuse to This is a plain proof, that the whole naval power of the Persian empire at that time, against the without the affistance of the Tyrians, was not able to cope with the Carthaginian 9.

In the year after the regifuge, the Carthaginians sent embassadors to Rome, and The Carthagiconcluded a treaty with the Romans. They were the first nation the Romans were nians concluded their first treats. acquainted with out of Italy, and with whom they entered into an alliance. This with the Rotreaty chiefly related to navigation and commerce, and was to be feen, in Polybius's mans. time, on the base of a column, in the antient Roman language, which, as that writer tells us, was fo different from what was spoken in his time, that those who were most conversant in the Latin tongue, could not, without much study and labour, c understand it. As in the preceding volume we have inferted this treaty as transmitted to us by the Greek historian, it will be intirely unnecessary to repeat it here. However, we shall beg leave to make four or five short observations upon it r.

FIRST, This treaty was figned twenty-eight years before Xerxes invaded Greece, Some observa. and gives us to understand, that the whole island of Sardinia, and part of that of tions upon it.

Sicily, were then subject to the Carthaginians.

SECONDLY, It appears, that the Carthaginians were very well acquainted with the coasts of Italy, had visited several of the petty nations seated there, and even made fome attempts upon them, before this period.

THIRDLY, It is evident, that this nation was tolerably versed in the art of fortid fication, and made it a common practice to build forts or castles upon their making a descent in any country; since they are prohibited by one article of this treaty to erect any forts whatsoever in the country of Latium, even in case they at any time invaded it in a hostile manner.

FOURTHLY, This treaty makes it manifest, that the Carthaginians were particularly careful to exclude the Romans from all the territories subject to them, as well as from the knowledge of what was transacting in them; as though, even at that time, they took umbrage at the growing power of the Romans. They seemed, even in these early times, to harbour in their bosoms the secret seeds of the jealousy and diffidence, which were one day to burst out in long and cruel wars, and which nothing could e extinguish, but the ruin of one of these two most potent republics.

FIFTHLY, The Carthaginians, according to Polybius, would not allow the Romans to fail beyond the promontory called the Fair promontory, lying to the north of Carthage, that is, to the fouthward of it, lest they should discover the fruitfulness of the land, and the happy fituation of the cities, and confequently should be tempted to make a fettlement there. This, it must be owned, was a wife precaution, and shewed, that the Carthaginians were not only a people of forefight, but likewise acquainted with the enterprising genius of the Romans, long before they came to blows with

THE republic being delivered from the imminent danger that threatened it in the Mago succeeds f manner above related, chose Mago to succeed Machaus in all the high posts he filled. Machaus in If we may judge of Mago's capacity from the good effects of his administration, he all his high was a person of most consummate merit and abilities. Justin tells us, that he was the post; nominious punishment. Of this Hanno, in Justin, not to mention others, is a pregnant instance (7). We must not omit observing, that the Greek word saves, which signifies a cross, is put often for a thors raferred to in this note.

P Just. ubi supra.

4 HERODOT. l. iii.

* POLYB. l. iii. p. 245, 246, 247. edit. Gronov.

piece of wood only fixed in the ground, by the Latins called palus or vallum. Our readers will find a fuller account of this punishment in the aufirst who introduced military discipline amongst the Carthaginian soldiery; that in a his time the dominions of Carthage were much inlarged, its commerce rendered more extensive, its riches increased, its military glory raised to a high pitch, virtue alone countenanced both in the army and state; in short, that he left his country in a most flourishing condition. His two sons, Afdrubal and Hamilear, succeeded him in all his high employments *.

And is fucceeded by his swo fons, A fdrubal and Hamilcar : Who command the army appointed to act against Sardin:2.

Astrubal and Hamiltar being adorned with the same virtues that rendered their father so conspicuous, the people of Carthage thought they could not do better than confer upon them the command of the army that was to act against Sardinia; which island, it seems, had then revolted from them. Accordingly they landed their forces here, and for some time carried on a war against the Sardi; but with what success, is not b faid: only we are told, that towards the close of it Asdrubal was mortally wounded, by which melancholy accident the intire command of the forces devolved upon his brother. The Carthaginians made great lamentation for this general, as indeed they had good reason; for he had been eleven times one of the suffects, and discharged the duties of that high function with great applause, and in his military capacity had triumphed no less than four times; nay, the enemy themselves looked upon his death as a blow given the Carthaginians equivalent to the cutting off of their whole army '.

Somewhere near this period the Carthaginians had a mind to shake off the African yoke, that is, to discontinue the tribute, which, by their original contract with that people, they were obliged to pay; in order to which they declared war against them. c The Africans having justice on their fide, success attended their arms; and, notwithstanding the power of their enemies, a peace was concluded to their advantage, the principal article of the treaty being, that the tribute at first imposed upon them for the ground on which their city stood, should be continued ".

The Carthagito shake of the Atrican yoke; but do not meet with success.

ABOUT this time Darius Hystaspis, king of Persia, sent an embassy to Carthage, requiring the people of that city to abstain from human sacrifices, and eating dogs embassy to Car-flesh; to burn their dead, and not bury them, as had always been the practice in their territories; and lastly, to furnish him with a body of auxiliary forces to serve in the that city to en- war he was going to declare against Greece, for which he was then making vast prepater into an al- rations. Every thing was complied with, at least in appearance, for some time, till all d tiance with bim against the apprehensions of feeling his resentment were vanished, except the last article, which the Carthaginians defired to be excused from paying regard to, because all their troops were then otherwise employed. Justin infinuates, that this monarch laid his commands upon the Carthaginians on this occasion; but this we can scarce believe, fince it does not appear from history, that Cartbage was ever subject, or even tributary, to the Persians; besides, this author, from whom the particulars here mentioned are drawn, affirms Darius to have fent embassadors to Carthage; which is a plain intimation, that the people of that city were not his subjects. That the Carthaginians, and consequently the Phanicians, buried their dead antiently, may be collected from hence; but this is so clear from scripture, that it stands in no need of any other testimony to support it. Justin likewise here observes, that the Carthaginians at this juncture were much embroiled with their neighbours; which seems to suggest, that either the war with the Sardi and Africans above-mentioned, or some other, was then carried on. It is no wonder Darius should apply to the people of Carthage for assistance against the Greeks, fince both the Persians and Carthaginians looked upon that nation as their common enemy.

Dirius Hystafpis lends an thage, inviting Grecks

> Some few years afterwards, the Greeks of Sicily, being extremely haraffed by the Carthaginians, solicited Leonidas to send some Lacedamonian forces to their relief ". From Herodotus it appears, that they could not obtain their request; but that however Gelon, the tyrant of Syracuse, was so happy as to preserve his own dominions, and even f to inlarge them. From the prodigious forces with which the Carthaginians invaded Sicily almost immediately after, it is probable they did not sustain any very considerable loss in that war. It cannot be inferred from Herodotus, as we formerly imagined, that the Carthaginians were driven out of Sicily by Gelon at this time; but only that the tyrant gained some advantages over them, extended his frontiers, and supported himfelf without the affistance of the Greeks, as the passage referred to implies. It is rather probable from thence, that both parties in the main kept what they were in poffeffion of before the beginning of the war, though the Cartbaginians might lose some Gelon gains some advantages over the Carthaginians in Sicily.

a particular districts, especially since, according to Justin, there was no considerable, much less decisive, action in it. The excellent character Herodotus has given us of Hamilear, and the high encomium he has passed upon that general's conduct, seem likewise to determine in favour of our present opinion 2.

NOTWITHSTANDING the Carthaginians, by reason of the various wars they were then engaged in, could not supply Darius with any succours against the Greeks, as has been just observed; yet it appears extremely probable from history, that an offensive and defensive league was made betwixt these two powers towards the close of that prince's reign. At least it is most certain, that an alliance was formed between Darius's successor Xernes, and the state of Carthage, not many years after the Persian b embassy above-mentioned was fent to that city. By the treaty concluded with Xernes; the Carthaginians were to invade Sicily with all their forces, and endeavour to drive the Greeks from thence, as well as the continent of Italy, whilft that prince should march in person with the whole strength of the Persian empire against Greece itself. But of this more hereafter b.

BEFORE we enter directly upon the transactions of the Carthaginians in Sicily, we shall beg leave to give a short account of the first footing this nation got in Spain. We are no where told in history precisely when this happened; nevertheless there is good reason to believe, from Diodorus Siculus and Justin, that it was very early, and before the times we are now speaking of. The former of these authors afferts, c that the great nerve of the Carthaginian power were the mines of Spain; that by them they were enabled to equip such powerful fleets, and bring such formidable armies into the field; nay, that by their affistance they made such great conquests in Sicily and Africa. Hence 'tis apparent, that the first Carthaginian settlement in Spain must have long preceded, not only the reigns of Xerxes and Darius, but even that of Cyrus himself. But this is still rendered more evident by Justin, who intimates, that this happened when the city of Gades, now Cadiz, was but of late standing, or even in its infancy. The neighbouring Spaniards, finding this new city beginning to flourish, attacked it with all their forces; insomuch that the inhabitants were obliged to call in the Carthaginians to their aid. Both of them being originally colonies from Tyre, d the Carthaginians readily granted their request; and furnishing them with powerful fuccours, not only repulsed the Spaniards, but likewise made themselves masters of almost the whole province in which the new city stood.

This happy beginning made that ambitious nation entertain thoughts of subduing Greatest part the whole country, to which they were also strongly excited by the rich mines above- of Spain rementioned. 'Tis probable they could not push their conquests far at first, because dued till the they had there to do with very warlike nations, who defended themselves with great time of Hannicourage and refolution. It appears from the accounts of Livy and Polybius, that the ball greatest part of Spain remained unsubdued 'till the wars of Hamiltar, Astrubal, and Hannibal. Nay, 'tis very probable the Carthaginians could never have intirely reduced e so many provinces there, as Strabo observes, had all the Spaniards formed but one state, or mutually assisted one another. But as every canton, every people, were intirely detached from their neighbours, and had not the least correspondence with them, they all by degrees fell a prey to the common enemy.

WE are told by Diodorus Siculus, as has been taken notice of in the chronological The Carthagitable, that the Carthaginians planted a colony in the island Ebusus or Eresus, now mans plant a Tvica, on the coast of Spain, an hundred and sixty years after the foundation of island Ebusus, their city. The city Erefus, the capital of the island, built by this colony, was or Erefus, now furrounded with a good wall, and had a commodious harbour for ships. The houses Yvicar in it were for the most part built in an elegant taste, and inhabited by a variety of f barbarous nations, as Diodorus calls them; but the most numerous of these were the Phanicians or Carthaginians. 'Tis highly probable therefore, that about this time the Balearic islands, at present known by the names of Majorca and Minorca, were likewise either planted or reduced by the same people. This can scarce be doubted, if we consider, that the name itself is Phanician or Punic; that Ebusus is but seven hundred stadia, i. e. not an hundred miles, distant from the Balearic islands; that the Carthaginians possessed these islands from so remote an antiquity, that their first arrival here is prior to every thing related of them by any historian now extant. except their peopling the island Ebusus; and that, according to Vitruvius, Ebusus;

* Herodot l. vii. Justin. l. x'x.
Sic l. v. c. 2. Justin. l. x'iv. fub fin.
Vol. VI. Nº 10.

JUSTIN L. XIX.

b Diodor. Sic. l. xi. c. 1, 2.

Diop.

was reckoned to belong to the Balearic islands, which 'tis very natural to suppose. a Now as we learn from Justin, that the first expedition the Carthaginians made to Spain was in order to affilt the new city of Gades (A) above-mentioned; and as the Carthaginian fleet failing from Carthage to Gades easily might, nay, almost naturally would, take Ebusus, and the other Balearic islands, in its way, there is pretty good reason to believe, that Gades was succoured, and Ebusus, with the other Balearic islands, planted or reduced much about the same time. The particular periods likewise, in which Justin and Diodorus have related these events to have happened, seem nearly to correspond; which in some measure confirms our opinion. Let this be admitted, and it will follow, that the Carthaginians made their first descent in Spain about an hundred and sixty years after the building of their city, which we apprehend to be one of the most early b foreign transactions they were concerned in. Farther, since Carthage was so potent when Gades was in its infancy, we must suppose the former to have been at least eighty or an hundred years older than the latter; and if so, Dido might have founded her city not far from the time of the Trojan war, fince, according to Velleius, Gades was built by the Tyrians about that number of years after the destruction of Troy. This is an additional argument in favour of what Sir Isaac Newton has advanced as to the time of that destruction, and seems to carry with it an air of probability. As to Velleius's affertion, that Gades was more antient than Cartbage, he is plainly refuted by Diodorus and Justin, and the reason of the thing; neither had he afferted this, had it not been in consequence of an hypothesis. The Romans in his time c generally followed the technical chronology of Eratostbenes, supposing it to be true: Velleius finding therefore in some good author, that Gades was absolutely affirmed to be built by the Tyrians eighty or an hundred years after the Trojan war; and by the Punic records, that Carthage was betwixt two and three hundred years later than that war, according to the artificial chronology of Eratosthenes, which he took for granted was true; he thence concluded, that Gades was older than Carthage. But the Eratosthenean chronology is now by some very learned men believed to have placed the destruction of Troy near three hundred years too high; and if so, no great stress is to be laid upon it. Velleius's authority therefore, when he afferts the city of Gades to have been built about eighty or an hundred years after the Trojan war, d depends upon some good author, as is plain from Justin compared with Virgil, Servius, Apollodorus, and the marbles; but when he makes it older than Cartbage, upon the chronology of Eratostbenes, which cannot be intirely relied upon, particularly in the point before us, as appears from Justin, Diodorus, and others; in the first case therefore it is pretty widely different from what it is in the other. Justin clearly intimates, that the inhabitants of the island Gades had a temple there facred to Hercules, before the city was built; fo that nothing can be inferred from that temple's being erected either about or immediately after the time of the Trojan war, in prejudice of what has been advanced; which yet we are far from positively insisting upon as matter of fact, but only propose it to our readers as a point deserving farther e confideration. On this occasion it may not be improper to remind our readers, that, according to the common computation, Troy was taken the twenty fourth day of the month Thargelion, or April, 1184 years before Christ; whereas Sir Isaac Newton places it 904 years only before the commencement of the christian æra d.

d DIOD. Sic. l. v. c. r. VITRUV. JUSTIN, ubi fup. VELL. PATERC. l. i. fub init. Newton's chronol. p. 3, 66, 112, &c.

distances of time, before they could settle upon it; which, in conjunction with what has been advanced by Philostratus, renders it highly probable, that the city was, at least, of as late a foundation as we have supposed. The author of the esymologicon indeed infinuates it to have been built by Archaleus, the son of Phanix, which will carry it back to a very remote antiquity; but this savours so much of sable, that but little credit is to be given to it. We shall only at present farther observe, that Cadix and Tarsessum were frequently mistaken for one another. A particular description and history of this city may be expected from us, when we come to the history of Spain (1).

(1) Strab.l.iii. Philostrat. in vit. Apollon. l.v. c. 1. apud Phot. & Newton's thronol. p. 112, 113. Sallust. in fragment. ex hist. l. ii. Festus Avienus in or. marit. Plin. Arrian, &c. apud Bochart. in Chan. l.i. c. 34. Solin. Islat. Hespeh. apud eund. & Liv. l. xxviii.

(A) It appears from the word Gadir or Gaddir, the true Phoenician or Panie name of Cadiz, that the city received its name from the island on which it was feated, and therefore that the Tyrians were in possession of it some time before they built the city. For Gadir properly signifies an inclosure, or spot of ground separated from all other tracts, as this island was by the sea. It likewise denotes a sence or mound, as this island was doubtless considered by the Phoenicians, after their long and fatiguing voyages, against the rage and sury of the sea. According to Strabo, the Tyrians first sailed to this island a considerable time after Hercules was desired; and made several fruitless expeditions, at considerable

ANOTHER motive to the Carthaginians to make themselves masters of Spain, was Soldiers from the great number of brave recruits found in that country. The Spaniards were valiant, Spain one great easily disciplined, and capable of enduring all kinds of labour and fatigue. With nerve of the fuch immense treasure therefore as they annually drew from thence, and such bodies power. of the best foldiers as were continually formed there for their service, 'tis no wonder the Carthaginians should make such prodigious efforts, as we learn from history they did, to enflave all their neighbours of

As Diodorus Siculus has given us a description of Sicily, Sardinia, the Balearic islands, First fertlement Corfica, &c. in the same chapter, we think this authorizes us to speak a word or two of the Carthihere concerning the first Carthaginian settlement in the island last-mentioned. Sar-ginians in Corbinia, as has been intimated above, was in the hands of the Carthaginians, and had been fo for fome time, when the first treaty was concluded between them and the Romans. Corfica likewise, we have reason to imagine, was possessed by them either wholly, or in part, in very antient times. This island was called by the Greeks Cyrnus, by the Romans and natives Corfica, had a beautiful large harbour, according to Diodorus, named Syracusium, together with two considerable cities, Calaris, or Aleria, built by the Phoceans, and Nicea by the Etruscans. Notwithstanding the deseat of the Carthaginian and Etruscan sleets by the Phoceans, in the reign of Cyrus abovementioned, the victory cost the latter so dear, that they were obliged to abandon Cyrnus to the former. And we are farther informed by Herodotus, that the Cyrnians, c i. e. the Corsicans, were one of those nations, out of which the Carthaginians formed that vast army, with which they invaded Sicily in the days of Gelon. These, to omit many others, that might easily be produced, are sufficient proofs, that the state of Carthage had a footing, at least, in Corsica in very remote times t.

THE small islands of Melita and Gaulos, now Malta and Gozo or Gozzo, being Malta and conveniently fituated for trade, and having commodious ports, were indiffutably Gozo antiently in subjection likewise to the Carthaginians. It appears from Diodorus, that these subject to Carthaginians or their ancestors the Physical Carthaginians or their ancestors the Physical Carthaginians or their ancestors the Physical Carthaginians or their ancestors the Physical Carthaginians or their ancestors the Physical Carthaginians or their ancestors the Physical Carthaginians or their ancestors the Physical Carthaginians or their ancestors the Physical Carthaginians or their ancestors the Physical Carthaginians or their ancestors the Physical Carthaginians or their ancestors the Physical Carthaginians or their ancestors the Physical Carthaginians or their ancestors the Physical Carthaginians or their ancestors are considered to the Carthaginians of the Carthaginians or their ancestors are considered to the Carthaginians of the Carthaginians of the Carthaginians or their ancestors are considered to the Carthaginians of the Car islands were at first peopled either by the Carthaginians, or their ancestors the  $Pk\alpha$ nicians &.

We have above observed, that part of the isle of Sicily was subject to the state When the Card of Carthage before the beginning of the Persian empire; but when the Carthaginians thaginians first first carried their arms thither, for want of sufficient light from history, we cannot carried their take upon us to determine. M. Rollin affirms Xerxes to have been the first who cily, unknown. prompted that people to attempt conquering the island at present under consideration, which is contrary to the faith of history; and immediately after, almost in the same breath, declares the period in which the Carthaginians first landed there in an hostile manner, not to be exactly known. This is a plain inconsistency, but not the only one in his system of antient history. As we have already given so particular a description of Sicily, as well as those heroic atchievements and great transactions, of which it was for so many ages the theatre, we shall have occasion to refer our readers. e frequently to some of the preceding parts of this work; though after all, in order to preserve and continue the thread of our history, we shall find repetitions in many places unavoidable h.

However, in order to render these the more tolerable, whenever we are obliged to them, we shall endeavour to diversify the narration with several fresh incidents, not mentioned in any of our former volumes, as not so immediately relating to the histories of the countries we were then upon, drawn either from the historians quoted by us there, or others which at that time had escaped us.

AFTER the conclusion of the treaty with Xerxes, the Carthaginians, in pursuance The Carthagiof their engagements, made vast preparations for a war with the Greeks of Sicily, nians make f both by fea and land. The Carthaginians at this time were the most powerful people great preparaof all the west; and while the Persians invaded Greece, they were to fall upon the expedition to Greek colonies, both in Sicily and Magna Gracia, as above, that thereby the Greeks, Sicily. of all countries and denominations, might be diverted from helping one another. The preparations for this war were so prodigious, that it was three years before they were completed, notwithstanding Xerxes sent them vast sums of money from Persia for that purpose. With these they hired great numbers of mercenaries in Spain, Gaul, Liguria, Corsica, &c. and raised what forces they could in Africa. All things at last f Diop. Sic. ubi fup. c. 1. Heropor. l. vii. DIOD. Sic. I. V. C. 2. M. ROLLIN in hist. ancien. des Carthag. p. a. c. 1. sub init.

E Diop. Sic. ubi sup.

being in readiness, they set fail from Carthage with an army of three hundred thou- a fand men, composed of different nations, and a fleet of above two thousand ships of war, with three thousand transports, not doubting but to make an intire conquest of Sicily the first campaign i.

Himilan's horses and chariots loft in a

THE general who commanded in this expedition was Hamilear, the fon of Hanno, according to Herodotus, or of Mago, as Justin will have it, a person of great authority both in the army and the city, who had behaved himself with uncommon conduct and bravery on many occasions in the service of his country. In his passage from Carthage to Sicily, his horses and chariots, with the vessels they were on board, perished in a storm, which the Carthaginians doubtless, being extremely addicted to superstition, looked upon as ominous. However, the general himself, upon his b arrival at Panormus, now Palermo, endeavoured to diffipute all gloomy apprehenfions, by declaring, that fince they were happily arrived in Sicily, he looked upon the war as concluded, and that all the pain the late florm gave him was a fear of the Sicilians escaping the danger that threatened them k.

He invests Himera.

AFTER he had landed his troops, he halted three days to refresh them, and repair the damage his fleet had fustained in the late storm; and then marching to Himera, a city in the neighbourhood of Panormus, immediately caused it to be in-To give some idea of the capacity of this general, Diodorus tells us, that, upon his fitting down before Himera, he disposed his army in two camps, the one destined for the land forces, the other for the ships and marines. He took care to c fecure his long ships or galleys, by drawing them on shore, surrounding them with an entrenchment, and placing all his marines there for their defence. The land forces were encamped in front, opposite to the city, extending themselves from the lines of the other camp to the hills overlooking the town. The place being thus blocked up on the west side, he unladed the ships of burden of their provisions, and fent away what veffels he had left to Africa and Sardinia for a further supply. After this he advanced with the flower of his army to the very walls of the city, routed a party of the garifon in a fally they made upon him, and thereby struck a great terror into the belieged 1.

Gélon defeats the Cuthag mian foragers.

Theron, tyrant of the Agrigentines, at that time commanded in the place, who, d though his garison was very strong, being intimidated by the last disaster, as well as the numerous forces of the enemy, dispatched an express to Gelon at Syracuse, with all possible expedition, for immediate relief. Gelon having got his troops in readine's to march at an hours warning, upon advice of what had befallen the Himerwans, advanced to their city without delay, with an army of fifty thousand foot, and five thousand horse. He first encamped near the city, and afterwards fortified his camp in such a manner as to put it out of danger of being insulted by the enemy. By this means he infused new life and vigour into the garison, and freed them from all apprehensions of the Carthaginian power. He sent his horse in quest of the enemy, who were dispersed in small parties all over the country, in order to forage. These, e meeting with the Carthaginians straggling about the country without any discipline or order, fell upon them, took above ten thousand prisoners, and brought them triumphantly into the town. By this action Gelon's glory was railed to a very high pitch, and the Himerceans inspired with a contempt of the enemy.

surprising the

To demonstrate to the Carthaginians the high contempt he had them in, he caused opportunity of the gates Theron had before built, to secure him from their approaches, to be pulled down, and built others, more effential to the defence of the place, in their room. Carringinisms. In fine, Gelon being an able warrior, and excelling in stratagems, set his head to work to find out some method of destroying the Carthaginian forces without any danger to himself, or his army, which in strength was so much inferior to the enemy. f Fortune favoured the project he was upon by the following accident, which brought on a battle, and occasioned the death of Hamiltar, and the total overthrow of his

The Cirthagimions intirely defeated by

A courier was brought to Gelon, having been intercepted by a party of his horse, earrying letters from the inhabitants of Selinus, consederates of the Carthaginians, to Hamilear; whereby he understood, that Hamilear was to offer the next morning in the camp of the marines a folemn facrifice to Neptune, and that he had appointed a the Selinuntine cavalry to join him the fame day in the faid camp. Gelon, taking advantage of this intelligence, drew out an equal number of his own horse, ordering them to advance to the enemy's camp about the time agreed on, as if they were the Selinuntine. Upon receiving these orders, by savour of the night, they conveyed themselves privately to certain posts close by the Carthaginian camp, of which they took immediate possession; and the next morning approaching the faid camp, were admitted into it about fun-rifing, without the least suspicion. Hamiltan was then bufy in facrificing, and the greater part of the foldiery attending him without arms, according to Diodorus. But Herodotus intimates, that this general staid in the camp during the whole time of the engagement, which continued from mornb ing till the dusk of the evening, without intermillion. Diodorus adds, that the Syracusians, without the least opposition, making up to Itamilear, killed him, pursuant to their general's orders, cut in pieces most of his marines, and fet fire to the ships. Herodotus, on the contrary, gives us to understand, that Hamilear was employed the whole day in throwing heaps of victims upon a flaming pile; but that feeing his troops put to the rout, he himf If rushed into the fire, and was intirely confumed. Upon the firing of the ships, Gelon, who had notice of the success by a signal given him from the top of a neighbouring hill, drew out his army, and attacked the other The Carthaginians at first made a gallant resistance; but when news was brought them of their general's death, and at the same time seeing all their sleet in c a blaze, they had no longer courage to fland their ground, but betook themselves to a precipitate flight; and then the flaughter was dreadful. As Gelen's orders were, that no quarter should be given during the heat of the engagement, no less than an hundred and fifty thousand men were flain in the battle and the pursuit. The rest retired to an eminence, where they for some time defended themselves; but at last, for want of water, were obliged to furrender at discretion. This was the greatest blow the Caribaginians had ever received before that time; for they did not only lose their general Hamilear, who was himself by his mother's side a Syracusian, but had their whole army in such a manner cut off, or taken prisoners, that not a single man of it escaped to Carthage, to carry thither the news of this unparallelled Polyænus, in his account of the Carthaginian general's death, differs fomething both from Diedorus Siculus and Herodotus. According to this author, Gelon, finding himfelf not strong enough to attack the enemy, sent Pediarchus, the captain of his archers, who much refembled him, dreffed in royal robes, out of the camp, with orders to offer facrifice upon fome altars near the fpot of ground on which Fiamlear used daily to facrifice. Pediarchus was attended by a party of his archers, cloathed in white garments, with large sprigs of myrtle in their hands, as an evident sign of their going to perform so solemn an act of devotion. Under the myrtle each of them had concealed his bow, with feveral arrows, which they were to let fly at the general as foon as he came within fome distance. Hamilear, suspecting nothing of violence, came as usual, with his attendants, to address himself to the gods, and was immediately slain. However this may be, the Carthaginians and Syracufians, both of them ambitious of claiming so great a man to themselves, gave out, that Hamilear, upon the deseat of his troops, vanished, and was never afterwards seen. The former, notwithstanding his missortune, and their immediate resentment of it, in after-ages paid him divine The Carthagihonours, both in their capital city, and every other place where their colonies feated mans deify themselves o.

† Diop. Sic. l. xi. c. 2. Herodot, l. vii. Ephor. apud schol. Pind. Pyth. τ. ad ver. έλλωβ' έξέλχων. Diop. Sic. & Herodot, ubi sup. † Diop. Sic. ubi sup. # Idem ibid. * Dion. Sic. & HERODOT, ubi fup.

WE must not here omit observing, that Terillus, the son of Crinispus, invited Terillus inthe Carthaginians at this time into Sicily, and therefore was, in some respect, as well vites the Carf as Xerxes, the occasion of this fatal war. Terillus was tyrant of Himera; but being the nians into driven from thence by Theren, the fon of Angledonius, tyrant of Angledonius, be Sicily. driven from thence by Theron, the fon of Encfidences, tyrant of Agrigentum, he meditated revenge. To gratify which, at the infligation of Anaxilaus, the fon of Critineus, tyrant of Rhegium, who married his daughter Cydippe, he had recourse to the Carthaginians, being well affured they would not let slip so favourable an opportunity of inlarging their dominions in the island of Sicily. Hamilear, in order to fecure his fidelity, obliged him to fend his fons to him for hostages. This account Herodotus tells us he received from the Sicilian writers of his time, who made no ţi,

ĮŤ.

115

Ė,

2 7

&quot; HERODOT. & Diop. Sic. ubi fup.

POLYEN. first. 1. i. c. 27. cx. 2. HERODOT. ubi fup.

mention, as far as we can find, of the alliance between the Persians and the Cariba- a

Battles of Hi-

Herodotus farther informs us, that the battle of Himera was fought the same day mera and Sala- with that of Salamis; but Diodorus Siculus will have the Carthaginians to have been misfoughtshe defeated the same day that Leonidas, with his brave body of Spartans, perished at Thermopyla. Upon which he makes this reflection: "The gods on purpose seemed "to have destined the Greeks at the same time a glorious victory in one place, and a " most honourable death in another q."

Gelon rewards their bravery.

THE first thing after the battle Gelon did, was amply to reward all those who had his foldiers for signalized themselves in the action, especially the body of horse, to whom the victory was chiefly owing. The greatest part of the spoils, which were of an immense b value, he offered to the gods, adorning with them the temples of Syracuse and Himera. What remained, together with the captives, he distributed amongst his foldiers, in proportion to the degree of bravery and valour they had shewn. Many of the last, to whatever city's share they fell, were employed in public works for the common good; and so many were taken, that all Africa seemed to have been transplanted into Sicily. Some of the citizens of Agrigentum in particular, who had diffinguished themselves above the rest, had five hundred a-piece. The sugitives, upon the defeat of their army, being in the utmost consternation, sled into the inland provinces of Sicily, especially the territory of Agrigentum, where being taken alive, that city was in a manner filled with prisoners. The greatest part of them were put c in irons, and set apart for the public service. The work they were chiefly employed in at first, was cutting and hewing of stone; of which afterwards they built the largest of the temples at Agrigentum, and made those conduits or aqueducts to convey water from the city, which were so much admired by the antients, and called Pheaces, from one Pheax, who was the overfeer of the work. The Agrigentines likewife, by their labour, funk a fish-pond at great expence, seven stadia in circumserence, and twenty cubits deep (B).

Gelon compared to the most famous Greek commanders.

By the late victory, which was complete both in itself and its consequences, Gelon acquired great glory, and was justly celebrated by foreigners as well as his own subjects, as one of the most renowned and experienced generals any age or nation ever produced. d The stratagem by which the Carthaginian army was overthrown he himself contrived, and conducted throughout, being the life and foul of the army in the execution of it. Some authors have not scrupled to prefer him to Themistocles, and the advantage accruing to the Greek nation in general from this action to that gained by the battle of Platea. However this may be, it is certain we find no account in history of any engagement, wherein the like carnage was made, and such a number of prisoners taken. Neither did the Carthaginian fleet, consisting of that vast number of ships of war and transports above-mentioned, meet with a much better fate than their land-forces had done. Only twenty long ships or galleys, which Hamiltar had occasionally drawn out for necessary services, happened to be out at sea, when the camp of the marines was taken, and consequently escaped the general conslagration. These failed directly for Carthage; but meeting with contrary winds and tempests, before they reached that place, they were all cast away, a few men only being saved These arriving at Carthage, brought the dismal news of the intire in a small boat. defeat of their army, and the loss of their fleet. The Carthaginians, little expecting to hear of such a signal disaster, but on the contrary pleasing themselves with the imagination of reducing the whole island of Sicily almost without striking a stroke, were most strangely shocked at receiving this melancholy advice. As in all great reverses of fortune the nation we are discoursing of ever lost their courage, and abandoned themselves to despair, so in the present case they gave every thing up for lost. f Nothing but outcries and lamentations were to be heard throughout the whole city;

> Diop. Sic. & Heropor. ubi sup. P Idem ibid. Dion. Sic. ubi sup.

(B) This famous pond, the effect of Carthaginian labour, was supplied with water both from sounlabour, was supplied with water coun from four-tains and rivers, and excellently well stocked with fish of all kinds, serving both for food and pleasure. Great numbers of swans likewise rested upon it, which afforded a most pleasant prospect to the eye.

By the negligence of fucceeding ages, it was gradually filled up with mud, and at last became wholly dry ground. The foil was so rich in Diodorns's time, that the Agrigentines planted vines and all kinds of trees there, which brought them in a very considerable revenue (1).

a the enemy was already imagined to be at their gates, and all orders and degrees of people amongst them were overwhelmed with inexpressible grief, despondency, and consternation.

In this deplorable situation, the Carthaginians thought they could have recourse to The Carthagia nothing but Gelon's elemency; and therefore immediately dispatched embassadors to nians apply to Sicily, injoining them to strike up a peace with him upon any terms.

Sicily, injoining them to strike up a peace with him upon any terms. Upon the arrival of these embassadors at Syracuse, Gelon afforded them an instance His moderation of great moderation and humanity. Notwithstanding by the late victory he was become and humanity. the arbiter of peace and war, and had the Carthaginians intirely at his mercy, he received these ministers in a most affable and courteous manner. His prosperity had not in the b least elated him, nor rendered him at all haughty or untractable. On the other hand, tho' this deputation confisted of persons the most famed of any in Carthage for their merit and abilities, yet they behaved in a most mean and abject manner. They threw themselves at Gelon's seet, with tears begged him to receive their city into savour, and grant them a peace upon what conditions he should think proper to prescribe. This plainly shews how void the Carthaginians then were of that true resolution and magnanimity, which supported the old Romans in all adversity, and carried them through dations of an almost universal empire, and even to destroy the dangerous rival of theirs we are now writing the history of; though it must be owned this heroic virtue and c greatness of soul was much tarnished in their posterity, to say no worse, by some all dangers; that refolution and magnanimity, which enabled them to lay the foun-

actions they were guilty of towards the decline of the Carthaginian state. Gelon, like a good-natured prince, being touched with compassion for the miseries The terms on of the Carthaginians, granted them a peace upon the following easy conditions: First, which he that they should pay two thousand talents of silver towards defraying the expences of grants them a the war. Secondly, that they should build two temples, where this treaty of peace. should be deposited, and at all times be exposed to public view. Thirdly, that for the future they should abstain from offering human sacrifices. This last article shews the great humanity of Gelon's temper, and is a proof, that the people of Carthage were obliged a second time to abolish that barbarous practice for a certain period, at d least in appearance; for it cannot be doubted but they ratified this treaty, it being so advantageous to them, at a juncture when they were upon the very brink of

THE Carthaginians, having recovered their spirits, by the happy turn their affairs had taken, through the conqueror's great clemency and moderation, thought proper now to shew their gratitude to Damareta, Gelon's wife, who had forwarded an accommodation betwixt the two powers, and been chiefly instrumental in bringing it to a happy conclusion. They therefore, immediately after the peace, sent her a crown of gold, valued at an hundred talents of that metal. This crown Gelon turned into money, and coined pieces, called from his wife's name Damaretia, each of them being worth e ten Attic drachma's. The Sicilians gave them the name of Pentecontalitra, from their being fifty pounds in weight : (C).

WE must not omit one circumstance, which may serve as a surther instance of An i flance of Gelon's military capacity. Upon his first approach to Himera, to succour the Gelon's milibesieged, a detachment of his forces deseated many of the Carthaginian parties sent tary capacity. to sorage in different parts of the island. Besides what they killed, they took ten thousand prisoners, as above related. These probably were the worst troops in the Carthaginian army; and therefore a stratagem Frontinus relates Gelon to have been the author of, seems to bid fair for this particular period of time. This prince, Idem ibid. & Plut. apopth. 175. & de ser. vindic. deor. p. 552. Vide & schol. Pind. ad Pyth. od. 2. section Jac. Perizon. comment. in Ælian. var. hist. l. vi. c. 11.

(C) These pieces seem to have been rather medals struck on occasion of Gelon's victory over the Carthaginians, than common coins. The size of them supplies us with an argument in favour of this notion. The brass liters of Sicily was at first a pound weight, as the librs or as was amongst the Romans; and fixty such lises made a talent. According to Pollux, Damareta, and the other Syracusian ladies of distinction, brought all their silver utenfils to the mint, and the coin formed from thence was called νόμισμα Δημαρέτιου. dorus's relation is more probable; fince, if Gelon had been in great want of money, he would undoubtedly have stamped it in the smallest species, and not in pieces of such a magnitude, which seemed to allude to the great victory obtained over the Car-thaginians, as well as the immense booty found in their camp (2).

having a large number of prisoners, picked out the weakest of them, who were a auxiliaries, mostly tawny, and of a very despicable appearance; and exposed them quite naked before his foldiers, that they might have the most contemptible notion of the enemy'. Something like this happened, if we miltake not, in the late war betwixt the Turks and the Russians, when the former, to give their people at Constantinople the meaner opinion of the latter, led the most miserable of the captives they had taken from that nation in triumph through their capital.

What use Gelon Carthiginian Spoils.

Besides the public works above-mentioned, the Carthaginian spoils enabled Gelon to build two noble temples, the one to Ceres, and the other to Profersina. A tripod of gold likewife, of fixteen talents, he caused to be made out of them, and sent it as a donation to the temple of Apollo at Delphi, as an acknowledgment of his grati- b tude to that deity. If an infcription given us by the scholiast on Pindar may be depended upon as genuine, there were more tripods than one fent thither on this occasion in the name of Gelon and his brothers, who had all of them a great share in the fuccesses they gave thanks for (D).

Gisco, the fon of Hamilton, banished Car. thage.

THE Carthaginians, incensed at Hamilear, as imputing the late disaster intirely to his conduct, notwithstanding the great services he had done the state on other occafions, refolved, that his family should feel the effects of their refentment; and therefore banished his son Gisco, who, being thus obliged to leave his native country, retired to Selinus, where he died for want of necessaries. The Sicilian cities, that sided with the Carthaginians, upon their first application to Gelon, were received into favour, and c had a confirmation of all their antient privileges granted them, though the conqueror, with a very good grace, might have treated them in a far different manner ".

Little faid of the Circhagimians for feventy years.

FROM this time for full feventy years, that is to fay, till towards the close of the ninety-fecond, or the beginning of the ninety-third olympiad, we scarce find any mention of the Carthaginians, or their affairs, in the Sicilian history. The last blow they received in Sicily was fo terrible, that a peace of some duration was absolutely necessary for the re-establishment of their affairs; and it is natural to suppose, that, of all places in the world, Sicily would be the last they would, for a considerable period of time, chuse for the scene of action. However, a fair opportunity offering at the time above-mentioned, moved by their ambition, they embarqued in another war a there, which, though pretty bloody and expensive, ended with much better success to them than the former.

The Carthiginians render themselves independent in Africa.

However, in some part of this interval, several remarkable incidents, mentioned by Justin, Sallust, and Valerius Maximus, seem to have happened. The Carthaginians carried their arms against the Moors, Numidians, and other African nations, and greatly extended their frontiers in Africa. They likewise shook off the tribute, which, for a long time, had given them fo much uneafiness, and rendered themselves absolutely independent.

Have warm regulation of Limits.

THEY had warm disputes with the people of Cyrene, a Mediterranean city, the capital of Cyrenaica, built by the Therwans under Battus, who were a colony of the the Cyreneans, Lacedamonians, which arose from the want of a regulation of limits between the two e on account of a flates. As the Cyreneans were very powerful, much blood was shed on this occasion; but at last the two nations, after having almost exhausted each other by a long and expensive war, accommodated their differences in the following manner x.

> * FRONTIN. l. i. c. 11, 18. " DIOD. Sic. l. xiii. ÆLIAN. var. hift. l. vi. c. 11. * SAL. Jug. c. 79.

(D) We 'are further assured by Pausanias, that Gelon sent several valuable presents to the temple of Jufiter Olympius at Olympia, as a grateful return to that pagan divinity for the good success that attended his arms, with which he was furnished from the booty found in the Carthaginian camp. Among the rest there were three curious vestments of fine Carthaginian linen, each of them representing a coat of mail, which undoubtedly were looked upon as something particularly rare, since Xenophon intimates the Carthaginian flax to have been of a very fine nature. A statue of Jupiter also, of a prodigious size, was sent to the same place in the name of Gelon and the Syracusians, when they were full of the most greateful support for the state of the same place. the most grateful fentiments for the fignal victory obtained over the Carthaginians both by sea and land. Both these donations were of exquisite workmanship, being done by those celebrated artificers Pothaus, Antiphilus, and Megacles, at Gelon's order. Besides the golden tripod above-mentioned, Gelon fent a golden statue of Victory to Delphi, which feems to have been the third offering of that metal ever brought thither. This we learn from Phanias, Eresius, and Theopompus, as cited by Athenaus, who inform us, that before the days of Gyges and Crashes, kings of Lydia, all the votive gifts tent to Delthic confished of brass, and these not statues, but chaldrons and tripods. As this observation seemed to us curious, we could not prevail upon ourselves to omit it (4).

(4) Paufan, in Eliac, poster, I. vi. p. 379, ed. Hanov. 1613. Xenoph, de venat p. 975, ed. Leunclav, Frances.

1594. Phan. Eres. & Theopomp, apud Athen, in desprosoph. L. vi.

BEING

Being so weakened, that they were both afraid of becoming a prey to some foreign invader, they consented first to a cessation of arms, in order to a pacification Afterwards it was agreed, that each city should appoint two commissaries, who But at last should set out from their respective towns upon the same day, and that the spot they come to a met upon should be the common boundary to both states. Upon this, two brothers, acommodation. called Philani, were dispatched from Carthage, who advanced with great celerity, whilst the Cyreneans proceeded more slowly. Whether this was to be imputed to the lazine's of the latter, or to some accident intervening, is not certain. However, the last is not improbable, fince in those sandy regions, at certain seasons of the year, there are as violent storms and tempests as upon the sea; which is not to be wondered b at, considering, that in such countries, which are open and level, and have not so much as a shrub to break the force of the wind, sometimes boisterous weather must almost necessarily happen; and then the fand, being put into a violent commotion, is blown up into the air in great quantities, fills the eyes, mouths, nostrils, &c. of travellers, and by that means greatly retards at least, if it does not put an intire stop to their journey. Valerius Maximus intimates, that the Philani acted perfidiously, by fetting out before the appointed time, and there by imposed upon the others. Be this as it will, the Cyreneans, finding themselves too tardy, and fearing to be called to an account for their conduct at their return home, accused the Carthaginians of breach of faith, by beginning their journey before the stipulated time; insisted, that the convention agreed upon between their principals was broken; and declared they would fuffer all extremities, rather than submit to such a base and ignominious treatment. On the other hand, the Philani, with much seeming calmness and moderation, defired the Cyreneans not to talk in so lostly a strain, but themselves to propose some expedient, whereby their differences might be terminated, promiting at the same time to submit to it, whatever it might be. The latter then proposed to them, either to retire from the place they had fixed upon for the limit of their dominions, or fuffer themselves to be buried alive there, not in the least imagining they would comply with fo hard a condition. But herein they were disappointed; for the Carthaginian brothers, without hesitation, consented to it, laid down their lives, and gained The Philami a large extent of territory by that means to their country. The Carthaginians ever suffer them afterwards celebrated this as a most brave and heroic action, paid them divine honours, felves to be bu-

and endeavoured to immortalize their names, by erecting there two altars, with order to inlarge suitable inscriptions upon them. Strabo informs us, that no traces of these were to the dominions be seen in his days, tho' the place still retained the name of the altars of the Philani. of their state. However, 'tis not to be doubted but the state of Carthage, as long as it existed, kept them up, this being ever their boundary on the side of Cyrenaica. Sallust relates, that there was a fandy tract of ground betwixt the territories of Carthage and Cyrene, without hill, river, or spot in it, whereby to ascertain the borders of the two nations; so that they were obliged to have recourse to the method aforesaid. The love of one's e country is certainly a most amiable virtue; but that any civilized nation should carry this so far, as to allow the building of it upon fraud, persidy, and a violation of public faith, is very strange; yet this the Carthaginians did, if Valerius Maximus may be credited, by paying so high a regard to the memory of the Philani. That author however runs out into a wild and frantic encomium upon them, and thereby discovers much of the Punic disposition. In short, this piece of history gives us a lively idea of the Carthaginian notion of bravery and heroism, as do several other incidents to be found in the course of this history ".

THE Egestines, allies of the Athenians, after the conclusion of the Syracusian war, The Egestines of which they had been the principal occasion, by inviting the Alberians into Sicily, occasion ano-f entertained strong apprehensions of being called to an account by the Syracusians for ther war beall the acts of hostility they had committed against them. About this time also the thaginians and Egestines had some disputes with the Selinuntines about a regulation of limits, which Syracusians. at last broke out into an open rupture betwixt the two states; but the former dreading the refentment of the Syracusians, and believing they would affift their enemy with a large body of forces, clapped up a peace with the latter upon their own terms. Though by this peace the Egestines gave up all the points in dispute, the Selinuntines, not contented herewith, made farther encroachments upon them; which greatly irritating the Egestines, they had recourse to the Carthaginians, imploring their pro- 2 tection, both against the Selinuntines, and their confederates the Syracusians. affair meeting with great difficulties, it was for some time debated at Carthage what course it would be proper to take. On the one hand, the Carthaginians were very desirous to possess themselves of Egesta, a city which lay so convenient for them, and which would much facilitate the reduction of the whole island of Sicily, the favourite project this state always had in view. On the other, they dreaded the power and forces of Syracuse, which had so lately cut to pieces a numerous army of the Athenians, and was become, by so shining a victory, more formidable than ever. At last their thirst after empire prevailed, and, through the desire of getting the city into their hands, they promited the Egestines succours.

Idem ibid. STRAB. I. iii. POMP. MEL. I. i. c. 7. VALER. MAX. I. V. C. 6. Vide & CELLAR. geogr. ant. J. iv. c. 3.

Hannibal appointed to com-$10M.

THE general appointed to command in this war, if matters came to the last extremity, was Hannibal, the grandson of Hamilear, killed at the battle of Himera, and mand in the Sicilian expedi- fon of Gisco, the exile above-mentioned. He was at this time invested with the highest dignity of the state, being one of the suffeces, and a person of very great confideration. As he bore a natural hatred to all the Greeks, and was defirous to wipe off, by his own valour, the difgrace of that defeat, which he confidered as a stain upon his family, he fought, by all means possible, to distinguish himself on this occasion for the service of his country. He was indefatigable all that summer, and the ensuing winter, in raising forces, not only in Africa, but in Spain and Italy, and making the other necessary preparations; infomuch that, in the beginning of the c fpring, he had an incredible number of foldiers of different nations lifted under his flandard. But, before he came to an open rupture with the Selinuntines, he had recourse to Panie policy, endeavouring, by a trick of his, to over-reach both them and the Syracufians their allies. Being apprifed, that the Selinuntines were not fatiffied with the tract of land ceded them by the Egestines in the last treaty of peace, but laid farther claim to a great part of their territories, he defired the Syracufians to act as mediators in this affair, and endeavour to accommodate the differences betwixt the contending parties in an amicable manner. His view in this was, to fow the feeds of diffention betwixt the Syracufians and the Selinuntines, imagining, that if the latter should reject the mediation of the former, the confederacy betwirt them would of d course be diffolved, and consequently that each of them would more easily fall a prey to the Carthaginians. But his scheme proved abortive; for though the Syracusians interposed their good offices, in order to bring about an accommodation betwixt the Selinuntines and Egestines, yet finding these inestactual, they did not think proper to make use of any compulsive methods, nor to renounce the alliance they had entered into with the former. The Carthaginians, finding their artifices thus eluded, upon the return of their embaffadors, openly espoused the cause of the Egestines, and sent a supply of five thousand Africans, and eight hundred Campanians, to their assistance. The latter had been hired by the Cha cidians to affift the Athenians against the Syracusians; but, after their overthrow, sailing back into Campania, staid there, in hopes e that some state might soon stand in need of their assistance. Accordingly, the Carthaginians took them into their service, bought them horses, and placed them in garifon at Egesta; which place, at all events, they were determined to make themselves masters of. Notwithstanding this powerful body of Carthaginian auxiliaries, the Selinuntines, being both rich and numerous, held the Egestines in great con-

The Carthagi. nians and est off athossand of them.

THE Selinuntines, having drawn together a strong body of regular troops, ravaged all the country about Egesta, and despising the enemy, who were far inferior to them furprise the Se- in number, dispersed themselves in parties, without order or discipline, all over the linuntines, and territory of the Egestines, for the sake of plunder. The Carthaginians and Campanians f in garison, observing this, took the first opportunity that offered, in conjunction with the Egestines, of surprising them; which they did so essectually, that they put them to flight, killed a thousand on the spot, and carried off all their baggage. Immediately after this action, both cities dispatched embassadors to solicit succours from their respective confederates, the Selinuntines from the Syracusians, and the Egestines from the Carthaginians; which being readily agreed to on both fides, a most dreadful war broke out between the Egestines and Carthaginians on one hand, and the Selinuntines and Syracusians on the other.

THE Carthaginians, before they directly engaged in this war, took care to make The Carthagian estimate of the prodigious sums necessary to support it, and the numerous body of nians make forces requisite to carry it on with vigour; and having impowered their general Han-sions for a mar nibal to raise an army equal to the undertaking, as above-mentioned, and to equip a with the Selifuitable fleet, they appropriated certain funds to the defraying all the expences of the nuntines. war, intending to attack the island of Sicily with their whole power the beginning of the following spring.

Hannibal, at the time appointed, put his army on board fixty long galleys, and Hannibal lands fifteen hundred transports, together with an immense quantity of provisions he had his forces in Siamassed for their subsistence, military engines, arms, and all other things necessary city.

b for a siege. Setting sail with these, as soon as the season would permit, he crossed the African sea, and arrived at Lilybæum, a promontory of Sicily, opposite to the coast of Africa. Before he landed his troops, he was discovered by a party of Selinuntine horse, who posted away with great expedition, to give their countrymen intelligence of the approach of the enemy. Upon this the Selinuntines dispatched couriers to Syracuse for immediate relief. Hannibal in the mean time, landing his army, marked out a camp, beginning at a place called The well of Lilybæum, where the city of Lilybeum was afterwards built. Here he staid a short time to refresh his troops, before he entered upon the operations of the campaign.

According to Ephorus the historian (E), the Carthaginian army confisted of two Ephorus and hundred thousand foot, and four thousand horse, though Timeus Siculus (F) will not Timeus Siculus (F) allow their relations us differ in

(E) Ephorus, an orator and historian, was born in the city (1) of Cuma or Cyme in Eolia, and one of Isocrates's (2) Scholars. His history contained chiefly the transactions of his countrymen the Greeks for the space of seven hundred an i fifty years; that is, from the return of the Heraclide, to the twentieth year of Philip king of Macedon (3), in which year he beneged Perinthus. Plutarch intimates (4), that he wrote a particular history of Cuma. He was a writer of flow parts, according to Tully, and much inferior, in point of genius (5), to his ichool-fellow Theopompus. Seneca fays (6), he had little regard to veracity; which feems confirmed by most of the passages taken from him by Diodorus. His ignorance in geography is very apparent, from his making all the Iberians inhabitants of the same city; from whence Josephus rightly infers (7), that the knowledge of the western parts of the world came very late to the Greeks. Notwithstanding what has been faid, Diodorus informs us (8), that he wrote with eat accuracy, and in an elegant style; tho' in the last article he is contradicted by Duris Samius (9), and Dion Chrysestomus, whose testimony is of great weight in this particular. His grand history he divided into thirty books (10), to each of which he added a preface. Besides the performances above-mentioned, he composed a treatise de rebus inventis, of which Strabo(11) takes notice; another de bonis & malis, divided (12) into twenty-four books; another de rebus passim admirabilibus (13), divided into fifteen books; another de civitatibus Thracia, of which Harpocration quotes (14) the fourth book. Father Harduin ascribes to him a particular treatise (15) of the origin of cities, and another of the increase of the Nile; but, according to M. Bayle (16), the authors alleged by him prove no fuch thing; and indeed this he makes out very clearly. Ephorus is complimented (17) by Polybius and of the Cartha-Strabe; but not withstanding Diodorus seems so fond ginian army. of him, yet, in another puffage, that writer rells us, he related so many fulfities (18) of Egypt, that we must not expect to meet with any thing of truth in him. Dio ysius Halicarnasseus (19), as well as Dio-dorus, speaks tavourably of his style. The two other historians this last author ranks with him, are Theopompus (20) and Callifthenes. We find a valuable frag-ment of Porphyry preferved by Eufehius, from which it appears, that Ephorus was accused of being a plagiary; nay, of stealing three thousand ines (21), word for word. from Daimachus, Anaximenes, and Callisthenes. Lysimachus is said to have written a piece, containing all his plagiarisms; and Alcaus. (22) a fatirical poet, is affirmed by Porphyry likewise to have exposed them. He is ridiculed by Strabo (23) for the mention he makes of his native country. A fon, called Demophilus, survived him, who 24), being a scholar, was thought by some to have put the finishing hand to what his father left imperfect. A fuller account of him may be seen in Vessius (25), and M. Bayle, to whom we refer our readers.

10

319  38. 115

ΕĪ

(F) Timaus Siculus, a Greek historian of good note (26), the son of Andromachus, a noble Sicilian, who, according to Diodorus (27), assembling the su-gitives of Naxus, settled with them on a hill colled Taurus, to which settlement the city of Taurominium owed its origin. Timeus flourished in the time of Agathocles, and Ptolemy Philadelphus. Suidas and Hefychius will not allow him to have been a judicious compiler of history; and Polybius accuses him of betraying too great credulity, a want of judg-ment, and a trifling genius, on several occasions (28). He was a person of violent passions, as appeared both from his shameful calumnies, and impious flattery,

(1) Strab. l. xiii. p. 428. (2) Plut. in vis. Isocrat. p. 837. (3) Diod. Sic. l. iv. & l. xx. (4) Plut. de vit. Homer. sub init. (5) Cic. in Brut. Quintil. l. ii. c. 9. (6) Senec. quast. natural. l. vii. c. 16. Vide & Plut. in Dio. Phos. bibl. 245, &c. (7) Foseph. cont. Apion. l. i. (8) Diod. Sic. l. x. sub init. (9) Duris Samius in hist. l. i. apud Phot. bibl. 176. Dion Chrysost. in orat. de dicend. exercit. (10) Diodor. Sicul. l. xvi. (11) Strab. ubi supra. (12) Suid. in Ecos. (13) Idem ibid. (14) Harpocrat. voce Alv. (15) Hardwin. in judic. austor. Plin. (16) Bayle, in dist. hist. & crit. (17) Polyb. apud Strabon. l. x. & alib. (18) Diod. Sic. l. i. (19) Dionys. Halicar. de col. verb. c. 81. (20) Diod. Sic. l. iv. (21) Porphyr. de erud. audit. apud Euseb. in prap. evang. l. x. (22) Idem ibid. (23) Strab. ubi supra. (24) Conf. Fonsium de script. hist. philos. p. 43, 44. sum Athen. in deipnosoph. l. vi. (25) Voss. de hist. Grac. & Bayle, ubi supra. (26) Athen. deipnosoph. l. ii. & alib. (17) Diod. Sic. l. xvi. c. 7. (28) Hesych. & Suid. in Tiuat. (28) Hesych. & Suid. in Tipal .

allow them to have been much above an hundred thousand. Hannibal, after landing a his forces, caused all his ships to be drawn ashore, for fear of giving umbrage to the Syracusians, and then, being joined by the Egestines, marched to Selinus, which city Hinnibal lays he immediately caused to be invested, and began to batter the walls with incre-

fiege to Selinus.

which prejudiced many writers, and some of these even too much, against him. Because he was banished by Agathocles, he gave that tyrant no quarter after his death, not only describing his crimes and ill qualities in the blackest manner, but loading him with fibulous calumnies. He was acted to much by a spirit of revenge on this occasion, that he contradicted himselt in a most flagrant manner; for which (29) reason, the five last books of his hiflory, which treated of the act ons of Agathocles, were undoubtedly very deficient in point of veracity. On the other hand, if we may believe Suidas, he exalted his hero Timoleon (30) to a superiority above the highest divinities; to which that author adds, that for this he deserved a greater punishment than Callifthenes, who juffered death for deligning to deity Alexander a prince infinitely more illu-firious than Timoleon. He composed several pieces; one confitting of three books, de Syria, & ejus urbibus regibusque; another divided into fixty-eight books, de argumentis rhetorica; another intituled olympionica, seu acta chronica; two more, whose title: were, Ιταλικά κ) Σικελικά, consisting of eight books; and Έλληνικά και Σικελικά, whose number of books is not known. In the former of these two last works he wrote the history of Sicily, as far as it was coincident with the Roman history; and in the other he gave an account of the Sicilian transactions, as they were intermixed with those of the Greeks. His history of Pyrrhus was a distinct piece, as we are informed by Dionysius Halicarnasfens and Cicero (31). Diogenes Laertius quoted no book of his history beyond the eighteenth, though Athenaus (32) cited the twenty-eighth; which is a proof, that those authors paid no great regard to the divition of his Greek, Roman and Sicilian history, as given us by Vessius. Notwithstanding what has been offered by Suidas to invalidate the authority of Timans in the five last books of his history, yet this author himself allows (33), that, in all other parts of it, he adhered strictly to truth; and even according to Polybius, though he blames our historian in feveral respects, particularly for trusting too much to the reports of others, he laid it down as a maxim (34), that truth was the life and foul of history. However he might be imposed upon in what related to Africa, Corfica, and other countries that he was a stranger to, as Polybius intimates he was (35), yet we cannot help being of opinion, that he was an excellent and most faithful historian as to the Sicilian affairs, except when he discharged all the impetuous torrents of his rage against Agashocles, which indeed could never be vindicated. In most of those passages of Diodorus, wherein Timaus and Ephorus are cited as differing in their relations, the former has apparently a much greater degree of probability on his fide, of which we shall at prefent only give one instance, not having time to produce all the rest: Ephorus informs us, that the Carthaginian army, which reduced Selinus, consisted of two hundred thousand foot, and four thousand horse; hut, according to Timeus, it could not well have confifted of above an hundred and ten, or an hundred and twenty thousand men. Now, it is evident from Diodorus, that upon Hannibal's marching to Himera, immediately after the reduction of Selinus, his army confisted but of an hundred thousand men; for he was joined by twenty thousand Sicani on his march, and, upon his arrival before Himera, his army, including both camps, amounted but to an hundred and twenty thousand men. Since therefore we cannot well suppose the Carthaginians to have lost above ten or twenty thousand men before Selinus, because the fiege of that place was a very short one, it will follow, that when Hannibal first invested Selinus, his army, in all probability, confifted of about an hundred and ten, or an hundred and twenty thousand men, nearly as Timans related. It is certain Diodorus very well agrees with this historian; for that author tells us, Hannibal's army, upon his laying fiege to Himera, amounted to an hundred and twenty thoufand men, as above mentioned. However therefore in words he may have extolled Ephorus, and depreciated Timeus, yet, in fact and reality, he, in this place, as well as several others that might be recited, pre-ferred the latter to the former. Both Diodorus and Cicero (36) celebrated his learning and eloquence, the last of which was of the Afratic kind. Platarch (37) entertained different sentiments of his ftyle; and Longinus censures him for his affectation and pucrility therein, as well as the eager delire he shews to reprehend the vices of others, while he is blind to his own. However, M. Bayle has plainly proved, that the instances (38) produced by Longinus in support of his criticism, do not come up to the point, and that he deserved censure in this particular, rather than Timeus. Longinus owned, that fometimes he came up to the lofty and fublime style, had a great share of knowledge, and expressed himself very judiciously; but still he seems to us to have been so much prejudiced against our historian, on account of the numerous instances of illnature visible in the latter part of his work, that he had rather too strong a disposition to discover blemishes in him; which made him copy after Cecilius in finding imaginary faults, and thereby tall into the very same crime he condemned Timaus for. He lived to a very old age (39), some say, ninety-fix years. According to Polybius (40), he lived a sedentary life, which, in the opinion of that historian, must have disqualified him for writing history. Plutarch informs us (41), that he fell into the fo'lies of Xenarchus in several parts of his works, in drawing good or bad omens from the most minute, and even ridiculous, circumstances. Cicero (42) puts him on a level with Herodotus, Thucydides, Philiftus, Theopompus, Ephorus, Xenophon, and Callifthenes. That he was superior, in point of authority, to Ephorus, when he treated of the affairs of Sicily, we think pretty evident from what we have just advanced, which we remember not to have feen taken notice of by any other author.

(29) Suid, ubi supra. (30) Idem ibid. & Voss. de hist. Grac. p. 82. Vide & Antigon. in Baupas. hist. i. & Parthen. erot. xxix. (31) Dionys. Halicar. l. i. c. 6. Cic. epift. l. v. 22. ad Lucceium. (32) Diog. Laert. in Empedocl. l. viii. n. 60. Athen. in deipnosoph. l. xi. p. 471. (33) Suid. ubi sup. (34) Polys. l. xii. (35) Idem ibid. & l. ii. p. 105. (36) Diod. Sic. l. v. sub init. Cic. de orat. l. ii. & in Bruto, sub sm. (37) Plut. in Nic. Longin. regi I. ... c. 3. (38) Bayle, in dist. hist. & crit. (39) Lucian. in macrobiis, p. 642. tit. 2. (40) Polys. l. xii. (41) Plut. ubi supra. (42) Cic. de orat. l. ii. Vide & Clem. Alexand. strom. l. i. Plut. in Dio. Phot. bibl. 244. Aul. Gell. l. xi. c. 1. Diod. Sic. l. xiii. & c. Diod. Sic. L. xiii. &c.

dible fury. In his way he took Emporium, a town seated on the river Mazara (G), by storm; and having closely begirt Selinus with his army, which he divided into two parts, he formed the siege of that city. In order to push this on with the greater vigour, he erected six high towers, and brought as many battering-rams to the town. His slingers and darters likewise greatly annoyed the besieged, by forcing them from many fortisted posts. The Selinuntines, little expecting such a visit from the Carthaginians, as having been the only people of Sicily who sided with them against Gelon, and having long been disused to sieges, were struck with great terror at the approach of so formidable an army, and the resolution with which they carried on their attacks. However, as they had good reason to expect, that the Syracusians and their other consederates would send them speedy succours, they desended themselves with great bravery. They all joined together as one man in their efforts to repel so barbarous and ungrateful an enemy; even the men worn out with age, women and children, regardless of danger, appeared on the ramparts, ready to sacrifice their lives in the desence of their country.

In order to inspire his troops with courage, Hannibal promised them the plunder And takes it. of the place, by which they were greatly animated. The walls being inceffantly battered day and night by the rams, and other warlike engines, a breach was foon made, and the first who entered it were the Campanians, out of an ambition of distinguishing themselves above the rest; but they were repulsed with great loss, as were the Africans and Spaniards, whom Hannibal sent to support them. The fight lasted from noon to night, when Hannibal founded the retreat. In the mean time the Selinuntines sent expresses to Agrigentum, Gela, and Syracuse, acquainting them, that, without speedy affistance, it would be impossible for the garison of Selinus to defend itself against so numerous an army, provided with such a train of battering engines. The Agrigentines and Geleans held themselves in readiness to march; but however, thought it proper to wait for the Syracusian auxiliaries, that they might more successfully fall upon the enemy with their united forces. The Syracufians also, having certain advice, that Selinus was befieged, immediately struck up a peace with the Chalcideans, with whom they were then at war, and drew together what forces they could; but as they did not think them sufficient to relieve effectually the besieged, whom they apprehended to be in no imminent danger, they put off their march for some days, till they had got together a stronger force. In the mean time the Carthaginians pressed the siege with the utmost vigour. Hannibal, as soon as it was light, renewing the affault, possessed himself of the breach which had been made the day before, and of another, which his rams had opened near it; and, after removing the rubbish, with the flower of his troops charged the Selinuntines with such fury, that he obliged them to give ground; but could not put them in disorder, nor enter the city, they fighting like men in despair. Many sell on both sides; but the Carthaginians were constantly supplied with fresh men; whereas the Selinuntines had none to reinforce them, being all employed at once in defending the breaches. e affault was daily renewed for the space of nine days with great courage and resolution, and with incredible saughter on both sides. At length the besieged being quite tired out, the Iberians, after a sharp dispute, lodged themselves on the ramparts, and from thence advanced into the body of the town; upon which the women from the tops of the houses filled all places with cries and lamentations. The Selinuntines, now giving up every thing for loft, barricaded all the streets and passages, being determined to defend themselves to the last drop of blood; which occasioned a long and bloody contest. The women also, notwithstanding their first panic, forely galled the Carthaginians with showers of tiles and stones thrown by them from the tops of the houses,

* EPHORUS & TIMEUS SICULES apud DIOD. Sic. l. xiii.

(G) Rhodomanus, in his Latin version of Diodorus, calls this river Mazarus; but we chuse rather to sellow Ptolemy, Pliny, and Diodorus himself, who give it a seminine termination. Some believe the word emporium here not to be a proper, but a common name; and we are inclined to come into this opinion. The name of this town, we believe, was Mazara; for Stephanus tells us, Mazara was a castle or fortress of the Selinuntines. Nothing was more common than to give rivers, and the fortress seated on them, the same names, and that even in it may be sufficient to observe, that Gela, a city of great note in this island, had a river of the same name running close by its walls. On or near this spot there is a fine city, called Mazara, at this day; but no monuments of antiquity, according to Fazellus, are found near it. However, as it retains the old name of the river, and of Stephanus's Selinuntine castle, it seems to point out the true name of the town Hannibal took by storm on his march to Selinus.

Sicily itself. To wave all other instances at present.

o C

which

which kept the fate of this city for some time in suspense; but the Carthaginians returning to the charge with inexpressible ardor, and continually pouring fresh men into the town, the poor Selinuntines were at length forced to give way, and having abandoned the narrow streets, were pursued by the conquerors into the market-place, where making a stand, they were all to a man cut in pieces.

An inflance of

Selinus being thus taken by storm, and the plunder of it given up to the foldiers, the Carthaginit is impossible to express the misery to which the poor inhabitants were reduced, and nian barbarity. the crueities exercised upon them by the Carthaginians, who, it must be owned, on fuch melancholy occasions as these, generally shewed themselves to be most savage They raged in all parts of the town without restraint, rished the houses, and then fet fire to them, and either threw into the flames the women and children b they found in them, or dragging them into the streets, put them all, without distinction, to the sword. Neither did their inhumanity rest here; they carried it so far as to mangle in a barbarous manner even the dead bodies, some of them carrying about with them numbers of hands tied round their girdles, and others, out of oftentation; bearing the heads of the flain on the points of their swords and spears. The women indeed, who fled with their children to the temples, escaped the common destruction; but this was owing to the avarice, not compassion, of the victors; for believing that these poor wretches would, if excluded all hopes of mercy, set fire to the temples, and by that means confume all the treasure and valuable effects they expected to find in those places, they did not judge it proper to drive them to a state of desperation. The ravages in the city continued most part of the night, insomuch that every place was full of blood, horror and confusion. The surviving matrons had the mortification to see their daughters forced to be subservient to the brutal lust of the barbarians, which, with a fense of the dismal servitude prepared for them in Africa, made them wish they had not survived their friends and relations. In fine, after sixteen thousand miserable wretches had been cruelly massacred, and two thousand six hundred escaped to Agrigentum, the city was razed, two hundred and fifty years after its soundation. The women and children, about five thousand in number, who outlived this fatal day, were carried away captives y.

A body of Sciinuntines escapes to Agrigentum.

THE body of Selinuntines that retired to Agrigentum, made their escape by the d favour of the night, having found an opportunity of abandoning the city, before the enemy had forced the narrow passes. Upon their arrival at Agrigentum, they were received with great humanity and tenderness; corn was distributed to them out of the public stores; and every private person, out of his own generous disposition, liberally supplied them with all kinds of necessaries for their subsistence.

The Carthagimans plunder the temple; at Sclinus.

A few days after the city was taken, three thousand Syracusians arrived at Agrigentum, on their march to Selinus; but understanding that the city was taken, they fent embassadors to Hannibal, to treat of the redemption of the captives, and to beg of him, that he would at least spare the temples. Hannibal returned answer, that fince the Selinuntines had not been able to defend their own liberty, they deserved to e be treated like flaves; and that the gods, provoked at their wickedness, had forsaken both the city and the temples; whence it would be no sacrilege to strip them of their ornaments. This answer is a clear demonstration of the Punic genius at that time, and exactly corresponds with what Diodorus has related of the Carthaginians in this particular: "These barbarians, says that author, exceed all men in impiety; 66 for whereas other nations spare those who sly into temples, out of a principle of " religion, not daring to be guilty of any act of violence there, lest they should offend "the deity; the Carthaginians, on the contrary, moderate their cruelty to these " persons, that they may have a better opportunity of pillaging the temples them-The Syracusians however, not acquiescing in this answer, sent another f " felves." embassy, and at the head of it one Empediones, a Selinuntine, who had always been in the interest of the Carthaginians, and had even advised his countrymen to open their gates to Hannibal at his first appearing before the town. The Carthaginian general received him with great demonstrations of kindness, restored him to his estate, pardoned all the prisoners related to him, and even permitted the Selinuntines, who had fled to Agrigentum, to rebuild and repeople their city, and manure their lands, upon paying an annual tribute to the Carthaginians 2.

AFTER the reduction of Selinus, Hannibal marched with his army to attack Himera, Hannibal aswhich above all things he desired, in order to revenge the death of his grandfather tacks Himera. Hamilear, who had been sain there by Gelon, with above an hundred and fifty thoufund Carthaginians, and almost as many taken prisoners. Besides, as he had already punished the Selinuntines for the insults they had offered his father Gifco in his banishment, he now resolved to take vengeance of the Himereans, for being the occasion of that banishment. On his march he was joined by twenty thousand Siculi and Sicani, whom he fent, with the main body of the army, to lay flege to the city, while he, with a body of forty thousand men, encamped on a rising ground at a small distance from it. His troops being flushed with their late success, he pushed on the siege b with the utmost vigour, battering the wall with his engines in several places at once; but finding this not fully to answer his intention, he undermined it, and by supporting it with large pieces of timber, which were afterwards fet on fire, laid great part of it flat on the ground. Upon this, a warm dispute ensued, the Carthaginians making all possible efforts to enter the town; and the Himercans, having the fate of the Selinuntines always before their eyes, their parents, children, country, and every thing dear to them, to defend, and being moreover reinforced by four thousand Syracusian auxiliaries, with some troops from their other allies, under the command of Diocles, diffinguished themselves on this occasion in a most extraordinary manner; and repulfing the enemy with great bravery, immediately repaired the wall. In fine, c the Carthaginians having been constantly repulsed in their attacks for several days successively, were obliged for the present to desist from all further attempts to storm the town; which mortified them extremely, especially as they had not hitherto been able to gain an inch of ground a.

THE Himereans, animated by this advantage, refolved not to be any longer cooped TheHimereans up in the city, as the Selinuntines had been, but to endeavour, by one strenuous make a vigoreffort, intirely to dislodge the enemy. Having therefore posted detachments of their out fally upon the Carthagigarison at proper distances on the wall, to repel any assault that might be given, they nians. made a fally on the beliegers with their whole remaining force, confisting of ten thoufand men. The Carthaginians, little dreaming that the besieged were capable of d such an attempt, at first imagined, that the confederates of the Himereans had drawn together all their forces, to oblige them to raise the siege; which throwing them into a very great panic, the Himereans for some time easily bore down all that opposed them; and tho' the Carthaginians afterwards not only rallied, but collected their whole force before the town, to make head against them, yet their great number, an impediment to them at the present juncture, throwing them into disorder, they incommoded one another more than the enemy. The belieged, taking advantage of this, and being moreover inspired with sresh courage at the fight of their parents, children and friends, who, for this purpose, exposed themselves on the ramparts, charged them with such intrepidity, that they put their whole army to flight, pur-e suing them to the very hill where Hannibal was encamped. That general, seeing his army in consussion, hastened to their relief; upon which the battle was begun anew, and continued for some hours, victory inclining to neither side. At length But are rethe Himereans, being overpowered with numbers, gave ground; but three thousand pulsed. of them kept their posts, and covered the retreat of their companions, sustaining the shock of the whole Carthaginian army, till they all died upon the spot b.

THE Carthaginian army, though victorious, was yet rudely handled, the Himerean The Carthagitroops being much more active, and better disciplined (H), and, by reason of the nians sustain a cruel treatment they expected from their enemies, if conquered, inspired with a great loss in this action,

> b Dion. Sic. ubi fupra. a Idem ibid.

(H) Though the native Carthaginians were well armed, and good troops, yet the Africans and Numidians were, for the most part, a disorderly rabble, very little acquainted with military discipline. These last troops always made up a considerable part of the Carthaginian armies, and frequently permitted themselves to be surprised by the enemy; which fometimes produced dismal effects. Platarch, in his life of Timoleon, shews us how they were posted, and the order they observed, when the Carthagi-nian forces were in full motion to attack the enemy, and even when they engaged them. It is probable a great part of the army befieging Himera, confifted of these troops, whilst that under the command of Hanne, which covered the fiege, was composed of the national forces (20).

(20) Plut. in Timol. Polyb. l. xiv. Liv. l. xxx. c. 3. & l. xxv. c. 13. & l. xxviii. c. 1. Hendr. l. ii. led. 2. memb. 1. c. 7.

much

much greater degree of resolution. Ephorus says, the Carthaginians lost twenty thou- a fand men in the first action, before they were pursued to Hannibal's camp; though Timeus Siculus reduces this number to fix thousand. As there was a very sharp engagement afterwards betwixt the Himereans and Hannibal, many more must undoubtedly have perished, though the precise number of them is not given us by any historian. According to Diodorus Siculus, the Carthaginian army, that laid siege to the town, exclusive of Hannibal's camp, consisted of eighty thousand effective men c.

AFTER this action, five-and-twenty galleys, which had been fent by the Siculi fome time before to the affiftance of the Lacedamonians, and were now returning home, appeared off of Himera; upon which a report was spread all over the city, and the enemy's camp, that the Syracusians, with all their forces and allies, were coming b to the relief of the city. This was so far from discouraging the Carthaginians, that it put Hannibal upon a new enterprize; for imagining that the Syracusians had sent all their strength to support their confederates, he doubted not but the city must be left in a manner defenceless; and therefore, immediately embarquing with the flower of his troops in the galleys which lay at Motya, prepared to fail for Syracuse, in order to furprise that city. In the mean time Diocles, commander in chief of the Syracusian troops in Himera, a man of great forelight and penetration, advised the captains of the Sicilian vessels to sail with all possible expedition to Syracuse, lest Hannibal should make an attempt upon it; and this he was the more strongly induced to, since, if in another action the besiegers should cut off the best of his men, he plainly perceived, c that their own city must of course fall a prey to the Carthaginians. He therefore thought it adviseable to leave Himera for a while, and with one half of his forces to return to Syracuse on the galleys, leaving the other half behind him, which he thought sufficient to hold out, till he, after putting his own city in a state of desence, should return. This the besieged took very ill; but not being able to prevail upon Diocles to alter his measures, the greatest part of their wives, children, and other effects, they took care to fend on board the galleys by night, in order to have them transported to Messana d.

the defence of Syracuse:

Diocles em-

his troops for

barques part of

As Diocles and his men embarqued in a great hurry, they were obliged to leave the bodies of their companions slain in the siege uninterred. However, they carried d off with them many of the Himereans, with their wives and children, who could not find room in the other vessels. Upon his departure, the Carthaginians redoubled their attacks, and battered the walls night and day without intermission. On the other hand, the besieged, believing the ships would return speedily, were indefatigable in defending the walls, repairing the breaches, and repulling the enemy. Thus they held out against the repeated assaults and utmost efforts of above an hundred thousand men, till the very day the fleet appeared, when the Carthaginians, summoning all their courage and resolution, gave a general assault, and with their numtibith occasions bers bearing down all before them, drove the garison from the ramparts, and, in spite of their utmost efforts, entered the city sword in hand. The Iberians signalized e themselves greatly on this occasion, being the first that forced the besieged from the walls, and entered with them pell-mell into the town. There is no fort of cruelty which the barbarous Carthaginians and Iberians did not practife on their carrying the place; all they met, without regard to sex or age, were inhumanly butchered, till the general himself put a stop to the slaughter. The houses were plundered, the temples pillaged and burnt, after they had taken out of them those wretches who had fled thither for refuge; and the city itself levelled with the ground. Hannibal caused the women and children, that survived the first sury of the soldiers, to be preferved; neither durst any one offer the least injury to them: but the men, to the number of three thousand, he commanded to be carried to an eminence near the city, f where his grandfather Hamiltar had been defeated and killed by Gelon's cavalry, and there first exposed them to the insults of his barbarians, and then caused them to be cruelly massacred.

the loss of Hiтета.

The Campaniswed by the

Thus ended this campaign, one of the most prosperous the Carthaginians had ever ans think themselves ill met with in Sicily; after which Hannibal, dismissing the Siculi and confederates, and disbanding the Campanians, embarqued with the rest of his forces, and set sail for Carthaginians. Africa. The Siculi, upon their dismission, went home, as did likewise the Campanians; but the latter complained bitterly of the Carthaginians, because they looked a upon themselves as slighted by that nation, tho' they had remarkably distinguished themselves in their service at the siege of Selinus, and indeed through the whole course of the campaign. Himera had itood, at the time it was razed by Hannibal, two hundred and forty years .

Hannibal, upon his quitting Sicily, left a small body of troops with his confede-Hannibal, as rates, that they might not be too much exposed to the resentment or ambition of his departure their neighbours. After a short passage, he arrived safe at Carthage, loaden with the leaves some plunder he had carried off from Selinus and Himera. The whole city went out to troops to promeet him on his arrival, and received him with loud and joyful acclamations, as a rect his confegeneral that had performed greater things in so short a time than any ever before him f. derates there.

Animated by the late success in Sicily, the Carthaginians resolved now in earnest The Carthagito pursue the design which they had ever entertained of reducing the whole island. nians make With this view they began to make new preparations, and raise another army, com-preparations mitting the whole management of the war to the same Hannibal. But as hy reason for another mitting the whole management of the war to the same Hannibal. But as by reason campaign in of his great age he endeavoured to get himself excused from taking upon him the scaly. command in this new expedition, they joined in commission with him Imilcar, the fon of Hanno, one of the same family. These two generals being plentifully supplied with money, and impowered to raise what forces they thought necessary for so great an undertaking, not only made great levies at home, but sent officers with large sums into Spain, Libya, Sardinia (I), and the Balearic islands, to hire nume-e rous bodies of mercenaries. They received likewise large succours from the princes and states with whom they were in alliance, viz. from the Mauritanians, Numidians, and even the nations bordering on Cyrenaica. Besides all which, they took a body of Campanians out of Italy into their pay, which by experience they had found to be good troops, and such as they could intirely depend upon, especially when intermixed with those of other nations. When all their forces were mustered at Carthage, the army was found to confift of three hundred thousand effective men, as Ephorus informs us; but Timeus Siculus, with more probability, fays, that they did not much exceed an hundred and twenty thousand; a force, however, sufficient, as it should feem, to over-run Sicily in one campaign.

THE Carthaginians, in the interval betwixt the first beginning of their prepara- They people as tions, and their embarquing for the Sicilian expedition, drew together out of Car-new city in tions, and their embarquing for the siculan expedition, drew together out of con-that island, thage, and other cities in Africa, all persons who were willing to transplant them-that island, called by the selves, and with them peopled a new city they had built near the hot-baths in Sicily, Greeks, from which was from thence called by the Greeks Therma.

BEFORE the grand fleet, which was composed of a thousand transports, besides Therma. a numerous squadron of galleys, with the forces on board, set sail for Sicily, Hannibal sent forty galleys to reconnoitre the coasts, and get intelligence of the enemy. These fell in with a Syracusian squadron of equal force off of Eryx, and immediately engaged them. The dispute was long and obstinate, but at last victory inclined to The Syracuthe Syracusians. Of the Carthaginian galleys, fifteen were sunk, and the rest, by the sians defeat the favour of the night, made their escape. When the news of this unexpected defeat by sea. reached Cartbage, Hannibal sailed immediately with sifty galleys, designing both to prevent any ill consequences from thence to the Carthaginians, and to secure the passage and landing of the army 8.

e Diop. Sic. ubi fup. f Idem ibid. apud cund. ibid.

n

i e

1

也

ż

FDO

ļľ:

12 ξŢ, Ĭ

eres

and il for ini.

لنتفاق

Diod. Sic. ubi sup. atq; Ephorus & Timeus Siculus

(I) Livy tells us, that the Carthaginian armies were generally make up of a great variety of bar-barous nations, of different habits, different laws, different religions, and different languages, infomuch that they did not understand one another. As the Carthaginians applied themselves wholly to naval affairs, they employed most of their own hands on board their ships; and the most opulent cirizens did not care to expose their persons in the wars, but contented themselves with enabling the state to hire foreigners in their room. They might likewise have some political views in this conduct; for by it they might imagine their state to be rendered more secure, than if their armies consisted wholly of Carthaginian citizens, fince thefe could not be fo intirely trusted, on account of the different powerful factions prevailing at 'Carthage; belides, fuch an army as we have mentioned could not eafily mutiny, or revolt, fince 'tis impossible so many different nations should act in concert, or form any dangerous scheme against their principals. However, Polybius condemns this practice, and not without reason, since it not a little contributed to the decline of the Carthaginian state, and once brought it to the very brink of destruction (2).

(2) Lev. l. xxviii. c. 12. Polyb. l. i. & l. vi. Dlad. Sic. l. xx. & l. v. Chrift. Hendr. l. ii. fe.t. i. nem. 1.

Vol. VI. Nº 10.

UPON

Hannibal lands his troops in Sicily, and advances to

UPON Hannibal's arrival, the whole island was alarmed, and every city of consequence, having been before apprised of the great preparations of the Carthaginians, expected to be attacked first. Soon after, the whole fleet arriving safe in Sicily, Agrigentum; the troops landed on the coast of Agrigentum, and marched strait to that city.

THE Syracusians, and their confederates, had sent embassadors to Carthage to complain of the late hostilities practised upon them by Hannibal, and persuade the fenate to forbear fending any more troops into Sicily. But the Carthaginians returning a doubtful answer to this embassy, the Syracusians had put themselves in a posture of defence, and were prepared to give the enemy a warm reception. They had fent to the Greeks of Italy and the Lacedamonians to folicit succours, and dispatched expresses to all the Sicilian cities in their interest, desiring them to unite their b forces in defence of the common cause. But of all the people of Sicily, none were under fuch apprehensions as the Agrigentines; they seemed fully satisfied, that this great storm would first discharge itself upon them, and had therefore carefully provided all things necessary for the sustaining of a long siege, following therein the directions of Dexippus the Lacedamonian, an officer of great courage and experience. The Carthaginians, upon their investing Agrigentum, divided their army into two bodies, one of which, consisting of forty thousand Africans and Iberians, encamped on certain eminences at some distance from the town; the other carried on the siege, and fortified their camp with a wall and an intrenchment, that they might be the better enabled to repulse the sallies of the besieged. When they first sat down before the town, they invited the Agrigentines either to join them, or stand neuter, declaring they would be well satisfied with either point of conduct, and forbear all hostilities, if they only agreed to a treaty of amity and friendship. Both proposals being rejected, they attacked the town in form, expecting to meet with a vigorous relistance. And this indeed was not without reason; for the Agrigentines had obliged all who were capable of bearing arms, to affift in the defence of the place, and had moreover received a reinforcement of five hundred men from Gela, under the conduct of Dexippus the Lacedamonian, who was in high esteem at that time on account of his country, according to Timæus Siculus. Eight hundred Campanians also, who had formerly served under Imilear, were taken into the service of the Agrigentines, and & defended the hill Athenaum, which commanded the city, and was therefore a post of the utmost consequence. But notwithstanding these precautions, Imiliar and Hannibal, after having viewed the walls, and found a place, where they thought it would be no hard matter to make a breach, began to batter them with incredible fury. The machines chiefly made use of on this occasion were of surprising force; and two towers (K) were brought against the city, of a monstrous size. The first day out of these they made an assault; and after having cut off many of the besieged, sounded a retreat. However, the next night the Agrigentines made a fally, burnt the engines, destroyed the towers raised against them, and, after having made a great slaughter, retired in good order into the town. Hereupon Hannibal, intending to storm the e place in different parts at once, commanded all the tombs and flately monuments, standing round the city, to be demolished, and mounts to be raised with the rubbish as high as the walls. But whilst they were executing the general's orders, a religious panic seized the army, occasioned by Theron's monument being destroyed by a thunderbolt, which, by the advice of the foothfayers present, put a stop to the design. Soon after, the plague broke out in the army, and in a short time carried off a great number of the soldiers, and the general Hannibal himself. The Carthaginian soothsayers above-mentioned interpreted this disaster as a punishment inflicted by the gods in revenge of the injuries done to the dead. Nay, some of the soldiers upon guard affirmed, that they saw in the night-time the ghosts of the f

Which city he befuges, but meets with a warm reception.

Theron's monumens deftroyed by light-ning, which occasions a panic in the Carthaginian army.

> (K) Soon after the Carthaginians had invested a town, they raised a mount of equal height with the walls, if not superior to them; and thereon erected moveable towers, which overtopped the highest battlements and towers of stone, either upon the walls or within the town. These moved upon wheels, and with them the beliegers gradually made their approaches towards the body of the place.

They were very large, and capable of containing confiderable numbers of men, and fome of the finaller engines of battery, whereby the belieged were greatly annoyed. From these towers they made their assaults, and frequently flormed towns, or at least opened breaches in the walls, in order to facilitate that operation. Jufius Lipfius gives us a minute and particular account of them (3).

(3) Just. Lips. polier. l. ii. c. 3, 4, 6c. Vid. estam Died. Sic. l. xiii. Sil, Ital. l. i. & Ohr. Hendr. l. ii. fect, 2. memb. 1. c. 9.

deceased.

a deceased. Wherefore Imilear, in whom the whole power was now vested, ordered supplications to be made, according to the practice of Cartbage, and the demolition of the tombs to be intirely discontinued. A boy was also sacrificed to Saturn, in compliance with a custom which had from remote antiquity prevailed amongst the Carthaginians: by his orders Neptune likewise was appealed, and several priests thrown into the sea, as the most pleasing victims to that deity. Imilcar having, as he imagined, by these cruelties atoned for the sacrileges of Hannibal, and pacified the gods, renewed the affaults with more vigour than ever, filled the river with rubbish close to the walls, by which means he brought up his engines nearer the place, and played with them upon the town in such a manner as reduced the besieged to b great streights h.

In the mean time the Syracusians taking into consideration the deplorable condition of Agrigentum, and fearing it would undergo the fame fate that Himera and Selinus had done, began to think in earnest of marching to its relief. Having therefore drawn together the forces of their confederates from Italy and Messana, and being joined by the Camarineans, Geleans, and others out of the heart of the country, upon a review of their troops, they found them to amount to above thirty thousand foot, and five thousand horse. These judging sufficient for their purpose, they gave orders The Syracuto Daphneus, their general, to advance at the head of them immediately into the fians fend an territory of the Agrigentines, a fleet of thirty galleys, which sailed close by the shore, him to raise at the same time keeping pace with him. Imilcar, upon intelligence of their approach, the siege; detached all the Iberians and Campanians, with forty thousand Carthaginians, injoining them to engage the enemy in the plains of the river Himera. Pursuant to his orders, the Syracusians were attacked a few hours after they had passed the river, as Which is atthey were advancing in good order towards Agrigentum. The dispute was sharp, tacked by the Carthaginians, and the victory a long time doubtful, the enemy being far superior in number to but defeats the Syracusians. But at length the latter carried the day, and pursued the Cartha-them. ginians to the very walls of Agrigentum. Daphneus fearing, lest Imilcar should take advantage of the confusion his troops were thrown into by their eagerness in the pursuit, and thereby wrest the victory out of his hands, as had formerly happened d to the Himereans on the like occasion, railied them, and marched after the fugitives in good order to the spot they were before encamped upon, which he took immediate possession of. The Carthaginians lost six thousand men in this action (L).

THE Carthaginians escaped a total defeat, either through the fear or corruption, as it should seem, of the Agrigentine commanders. For the besieged, seeing them fly to that part of their camp that lay next to the town in the utmost confusion, The Agrigenimmediately concluded, that they were routed; and therefore pressed their officers tine commanders guilty of a to fally out upon them without loss of time, that they might complete their ruin. falle step, which They were however deaf to these solicitations, and would not permit a man to stir occasions the out of the town. To what motive such an unaccountable procedure was to be attri- loss of the place. e buted, is hard to say; however, the fugitives were hereby saved, and arrived safe in their other camp. This fatal step could never asterwards be retrieved, but was followed by the loss of the city k.

Upon Daphneus's arrival, a great part of the garrison, with Dexippus at the head of them, waited upon him, and a council of war was immediately held. Every one here shewed himself highly distarissied, that so fair an opportunity had been loft of taking a full revenge of the enemy, and destroying so many myriads of them. Hereupon great disputes arose, insomuch that sour of the Agrigentine com- A mating manders, at the infligation of one Menes, a Camarinean, were koned by the enraged wherein four manders, at the initigation of one sciences, a Camarinean, were notice by the eminaged of these communititude, and a fifth, called Argens, only by reason of his youth, escaped. Den-manders are f ippus himself was likewise highly reflected upon, and lost much of the reputation somed, and a

A Drop. Sic. ubi sup.

1 Idem ibid.

.k Idem ibid.

The armies being engaged, that general heard a great noise in the left wing, where the Isalian forces were posted; and bastening thither, he found them almost described; upon which immediately repairing to the right wing, composed of Syracujums, he told

(L) We are told by Polyanus, that Daphness de-feated the Gasthaginians by the following strategem: therefore, to render the victory complete, intrested them to exert themselves on the present occasion. Animated by this good news, they immediately cried out, Let us fall upon the enemy with the utmest fury. Upon which, charging them with incredible bravery, they soon put these to slight (4). Imilcar in great streights for want of provisions.

But supplies fully by intergran borts. corn, and all himself plenti-

Upon which the Agrigentines resolve to leave their city to the enemy.

he had before acquired, by concurring with the rest. After the council broke up, a Daphneus formed a defign to attack Imilcar's camp; but finding it strongly fortified, he altered his resolution. However, he guarded all the avenues leading to it with his cavalry, intending by that means either to oblige the enemy to perish with famine, or come out of their lines, and venture an engagement. Accordingly, all the passages being blocked up, and the convoys intercepted, that numerous army was foon brought to fuch streights, that the Campanians, and other mercenaries, began to mutiny; and going in a body to Imilcar's tent, threatened to join the enemy, if they had not their usual allowance of bread. The general, with much ado, prevailed upon them to bear patiently their present want for a few days, assuring them they should be very soon plentifully supplied with all sorts of provisions, and in b the mean time pawned to them the drinking vessels of the Carthaginian soldiers. He had been informed, that the Syracufians were then loading many ships with corn, to be fent to Agrigentum, and did not in the least doubt but he should intercept the convoy, the Syracusians not suspecting, that he would attempt any thing by sea. Accordingly, he dispatched messengers to Panormus and Motya, where his fleet lay, injoining the commanders to man the galleys with all possible expedition, and lie in wait, at an appointed place, for the ships that were to bring the provisions. His orders were put in execution; and forty galleys being speedily equipped, the Syracusian fleet, consisting of threescore transports, laden with corn, and all forts cepting a Syra- of provisions, was intercepted. Of their convoy, eight ships were sunk, and the c cutian fleet of rest driven on shore. This changed the face of affairs on both sides; for as such an unexpected relief gave the Carthaginians fresh courage, so it greatly disheartened the Agrigentines, who having already held out for the space of eight months, were forts of provi- in great want of all things, and without hopes of being relieved to quickly as their fions.

present necessity required. Besides, at the beginning of the siege, when bad success attended the Carthaginians, they had squandered away their corn and other provisions in a very profuse manner, by which means they were now reduced to the greater The Campanians in the service of the Agrigentines, observing the desperate condition the city was in, upon receiving fifteen talents from Imilcar, went all over in a body to the Carthaginians. Dexippus the Lacedamonian also, according to Dio- d dorus, was faid to have been bribed with the fame fum; for he on a sudden advised the Italian commanders to withdraw their troops out of the town, infinuating, that they were likely to be starved there, without the least prospect of rendering any fervice to those who had hired them: whereas, by retiring in time, they might carry on the war to greater advantage in some other part: with which advice complying, they left the Agrigentines to shift for themselves (M).

THE mercenaries thus falling off, and the inhabitants desponding for want of neceffaries, a council of war was summoned, when it was judged absolutely imposfible to hold out any longer, there not being provisions enough in the public stores to support the foldiery and people two days. It was therefore resolved, that the e city should be abandoned, and the inhabitants conveyed to some place of safety; and the following night was fixed upon for their departure. The people, being apprifed of this resolution, were thereby thrown into the utmost consternation. Lamentable outcries were heard in every house; and the grief and dread they were all feized with in feeing themselves obliged to abandon their native country, their goods and estates, or else expose themselves to the fury of a merciless enemy, were inexpressible. However, though their riches were immense, yet they esteemed life still more valuable and therefore, as they expected no mercy from such cruel barbarians, the greatest part of them gave way to unavoidable necessity. We shall not Drop. Sic. ubi fup.

(M) Polyanus tells us, that Imilcar (whom he calls Himilco) gave private orders to his men to fly be-fore the belieged whenever they made a fally, in order to draw them into an ambuscade. There happened to be a wood just before the town, in which he posted a detachment of his troops, with orders to set this on fire as soon as the enemy were ot at a considerable distance from the town. This firstagem had the defired effect; for the Agrigentines pursued the Carthaginlans with great ardour for some time; but at last looking back towards the city, they perceived the wood all in a blaze; which they imagined was a fire is fling out of the city itself. Upon this they retired with great precipitation towards the rown; but falling into the ambuscade, and being hotly pursued by the party that drew them out, they were all either killed or taken prifonces (3).

(3) Polyan. firatagem. l. v. c. 10. ex. 4. Vid. & Frentin, firat. l.iii. c. 10. ex. 5.

a here expatiate upon the scene of horror now before us, Diodorus Siculus having done this in a most affecting manner, but only observe, that the place appointed for these miserable wretches to retire to was Gela, where, when they arrived, they were received with great kindness and humanity, and plentifully supplied with all necessaries at the expence of the public. What happened to them afterwards may be seen in a former part of this history .

THE garrison was no sooner withdrawn, and the Syracusian army retired, but Imilear, marching out of his trenches, entered the city, not without some sear and Imilear enters jealousy, and put all those he found in it to the sword, not sparing even such as the city, where had fled to the temples. Among these was Gellias (M), a citizen famous for his great cruelsies, b wealth and integrity, who feeing that the Carthaginians, without respecting the gods, plundered their temples, and murdered those who had taken sanctuary in them, set fire to the temple of Minerva, and confumed in the flames both himself and the immense riches of that stately edifice. Gellias, according to Diodorus; was induced to this action in order to prevent three evils: first, the impiety of the enemy to the gods; fecondly, the facrilegious carrying off of the vast treasure lodged there; and, thirdly, the abuse of his own body ".

fent to Carthage o

Imilear having pillaged every part of the city, both facred and profane, found and pillages himself master of an immense treasure. Nothing less could be expected from the every part of it. spoils of a city, which was one of the most opulent in Sicily, containing two hundred e thousand inhabitants, and had never before been plundered, or even besieged. An infinite number of pictures, vases, and statues, done by the greatest masters of those times, fell into the enemy's hands, the Agrigentines having an exquisite taste for the To give our readers some idea of Agrigentum, it will be sufficient to observe, that the very sepulchral monuments shewed the luxury and magnificence of this city, they being adorned with statues of birds and horses, famous for their elegance. Empedocles, the philosopher, born in Agrigentum, has a memorable saying Empedocles's concerning his fellow-citizens; That the Agrigentines squandered away their money so saying of the excessively every day, as if they expected it could never be exhausted; and built with such Agrigentines. folidity and magnificence, as if they thought they should live for ever. The most valud able part of the plunder Imilcar sent to Carthage; every thing else he caused to be fold under the spear. Among other curiosities, the famous bull of Phalaris was

THE people of Syracuse, being prodigiously alarmed at the reduction of Agrigentum, had a decree passed for the raising a numerous body of troops to oppose the progress of the Carthaginians, who with a mighty army hovered over the frontiers. Imilcar having gained the city, after eight months siege, a little before the winter solstice, did not presently raze it, but there took up his winter-quarters, to give his army the necessary refreshment. The Sicilians in general, as well as the inhabitants of Syra-Many of the cuse, were struck with terror at the Carthaginian conquests, and many of them fled Sicilians, being e to Syracuse for protection, whilst others transported themselves, with all their effects, struck with to the continent of Italy. Those who took sanctuary in Syracuse, were treated with Carthaginian extraordinary kindness, and the chief men among them made free of the city. conquests, fly to a Idem ibid. See also univ. hist. vol. iii. p. 42. not. (X). protection. m Idem ibid. Univ. hift. vol. iii. Otoo. Sic. ubi sup. & Cic. l. iv. in Ver. c. 33.

Syracule for

(M) The munificence of Gellias may be learned not only from Diodorus Sieulus, but Valerius Maximus and Athenaus (1). He entertained the people with spectacles and feasts, and, during a famine, prevented the citizens of Agrigentum from perishing with hunger. He gave portions to poor maidens, and rescued the unfortunate from want and despair. He had built houses in the city and country, purposely for the accommodation of strangers, whom he usually dismissed with handsome presents. In short, Gellias's riches, immense as they were, were furpassed by his greatness of soul, his treasures being, as it were, to use Valerius Maximus's phrase, the patrimony of the public. No wonder then that the inhabitants of Agrigentum, and all the neighbouring provinces, should so ardently pray for his health and prosperity. No greater loss could have happened to that part of Sicily than the fatal end of so excellent a person, but the death and destruction of all those poor wretches, who should have regretted him. Atheneus, in all the present MSS. calls him Tellias; but Nicolaus Sturio has discovered this to be a fault of the transcribers, though it must have been a very antient one, fince Euftathius oftener than once calls him likewife Tellius. What Athenaus has concerning him is taken almost word for word out of the eleventh book of Timaus's history, and possibly Diodorus's may have been deduced from the same source. The great resemblance betwixt the capital sam (T) and gamma (I) might possibly occasion the mistake above-mentioned; for that it is a mistake, the printed copies and MSS. of Diodo-rus Siculus and Valerius Maximus sufficiently evince.

Vol. VI. Nº 10.

(1) Valer. Max. l. iv. c. ult. Athen. deipnosoph. l. i. Vdd. & If. Casaub. animadvers. in Athen. l. i. p. 12. Among Among them were many Agrigentines, who filled the city with their complaints a against the Syracusian commanders, as if they had betrayed Agrigentum into the ene-This raised such disturbances in Syracuse as at last gave Dionysius an opportunity of feizing upon the fovereign power. Imilcar, after laying it intirely in ruins, towards the beginning of the spring, left Agrigentum P.

The Syracufians fend D'onyfius to affift the people of Gela.

THE Geleans, receiving intelligence, that the Carthaginians intended to open the campaign with the siege of their city, and in the mean time falling out among themselves, implored the protection of Syracuse; upon which Dionysius immediately marched to their affiftance with two thousand foot, and four hundred horse. The Geleans were so well satisfied with his conduct, that they treated him with the highest marks of distinction, and even sent embassadors to Syracuse to return their thanks b for the important fervice that city had done them in fending him thither. Soon after, he was appointed generalissimo of the Syracusian forces, and those of their allies, against the Carthaginians. This enabled him to give many proofs of his great capacity both in civil and military affairs, as has been already shewn, and will further appear in the fequel of this history.

Imilcar marches with his army against Gela.

THE Carthaginian forces under the command of Imilcar, having, on the return of the spring, razed the city of Agrigentum, made an incursion into the territories of Gela and Camarina; and after having ravaged them in a dreadful manner, carried off such an immense quantity of plunder from thence as filled their camp. Imilear then marching with his whole army against Gela, took post on the banks of the river c Gela; and ordering his men to cut down all the trees about the town, fortified his camp with a ditch and a wall (N), not doubting but Dionysius would come to the relief of the besieged with a powerful army. The Geleans, in the beginning of the siege, were determined to send away their wives and children to Syracuse, as a place of greater fafety; but they all, running to the altars in the forum, could not be prevailed upon to retire, but protested that they would undergo the same sate as their husbands and parents. This resolution encouraged the Geleans to exert themtheir husbands and parents. felves in the defence of persons so dear to them, and to whom they were so dear, They made several sallies with good success, cutting great numbers of the enemy in pieces, and bringing many of them prisoners into the town. No sooner was a breach d opened in the wall by the Carthaginian rams (O), but the citizens repaired it,

P Drop. Sic. ubi fup.

(N) It will be proper in this note to mention fome particulars relating to the Carthaginian camps, which we have hitherto not had an opportunity of doing. When the Carthaginians were apprehentive, that the enemy would attempt to raise the siege of any place they had formed, they fortified their camp with a direh and a wall, as we learn here from Diedorus. Their camps feem to have been formed in a regular manner, refembling a town, and had gates to them. The Numidian camp was always separated from the Carthaginian; the reasons of which seem to have been, that the Carthaginians were generally foot, but the Numidians horse, and that the latter could not permit themselves to be confined to the rules of military discipline so easily as the former. The general's tent was, for the most part, fixed on an eminence in the middle of the camp, being much more magnificent and superb than the others. Hither the officers repaired to receive their respective orders; and a strong guard, Polybins incimates a thousand horse and as many foot, were generally posted before it. Near this stood the sacred tabernacle, and the altar, where the general, and officers of distinction, performed their devotions. The Carehaginian tents seem to their devotions. have been raised in a regular manner of wood, fascines, &c. resembling so many cottages; but the Numidian were the reverse, consisting only of reeds, ftraw, stubble, and other such-like flight materials(2). (O) The ram was a battering engine used in:

sieges by the antients. Pliny tells us it was found out by Epens, a Greek, at the siege of Troy; but this is not very probable, because we find no men-tion made of it in Homer, who, if such a wonderful machine had been then known, could not poffibly have omitted taking notice of it. Tis therefore much more likely, that the Carthaginians invented it, as Virneins and Tertullian believe, with whom Libsius agrees. The ram was a large beam, equal to the mast of a ship, with a head of solid iron, resembling that of a sam, from whence it derived it's name. This was fastened in the middle to another beam supported by a large piece of a inother beam, supported by a large piece of timber on each side, by ropes, in such a manner as to be pendulous like a balance. This being drawn backwards by a great number of hands as far as possible, was then pushed forwards with as great an imperus as they could give it, so that the iron head beating against the walls of a city with inconceivable force, easily shook them; neither was there any wall on tower but what this, by repeated blows, was capable of battering down. As these blows, in some respects, resembled the buttings of a ram, this was a furtherreason for giving the machine the name of that animal. Appian relates, that the Romans battered the walls of Caribage with two rams of an immense fize, one of which was played by a body of fix thousand foot, and the other by a vast number of rowers, which may ferve to give us some idea of this terrible engine. Tis mentioned by the prophet a being indefatigable night and day on the ramparts, where their wives and children chearfully shared with them the labour and danger. The young men were continually in arms, and engaged with the enemy, and the rest employed in working and other necessary services. In fine, they defended themselves with such courage and And meets resolution, that, though their city was but very indifferently fortified, they held out with a vigora long time against a most formidable army, without receiving the least affistance our resistance. from their allies 9.

(2) Liv. l. xxvi. c. 13. & l. xxviii. c. 1. Diod. Sic. l. xiii. Just. Lips. l. v. dial. 2. milit. Rom. Polyh. l. i. c. 45. & l. iii. c. 71. Diod. Sic. l. xx. Liv. l. xxx. c. 3. Polyh. l. vi. Plutarch in Scip. Lips milit. Rom. l. v. dial. 5. & Christ. Hendr. Careto. h. ii. sect. 2. memb. 1. 6. 7.

In the mean time Dionysius, by the junction of his mercenaries, and succours from Dionysius ad-Magna Gracia with the Syracusians, almost every one of whom capable of bearing vances to the arms he obliged to lift under his standard, formed an army of fifty thousand foot, according to some, though Timeus Siculus makes them only thirty thousand, and b a thousand horse; with which, and fifty sail of ships, he advanced to the relief of Gela. Upon his arrival before the city, he encamped near the fea, that his fleet and army might act in concert. With his light-armed troops he proposed to prevent the enemy from foraging, whilst his horse and shipping should intercept all provisions coming to their camp from any part of the Carthaginian dominions; which he doubted not would greatly distress them. However, for twenty days he effected nothing; which much chagrining him, he resolved to attack the enemy's camp, and, in order to this, made the following disposition of his forces: The Sicilian And arracks foot had orders to move towards the left, and attack the enemy's trenches; the the enemy's troops of the confederates were to file off to the right, and marching to the shore, camp; c attempt the camp in the weakest place; the mercenaries, under his conduct, were to advance through the town, to the fpot where the Carthaginian engines were placed, in order to destroy them; the horse he commanded to pass the Gela, upon a fignal given by the foot, to join them, if superior to the enemy, or, if repulsed, to support them; and lastly, the sea-officers received orders to approach as near the enemy's camp as possible with the ships, when the Italian troops came up. As Imilear had fent a strong detachment towards the shore, to oppose the enemy's land-

9 Idem ibid.

Ezekiel in two passages, and Nebuchadnezzar made use of it at the siege of Jurusalem. Whether the Carthaginians, or their ancestors the Tyrians, sfor both sometimes went by the same name) first discovered it, cannot be certainly determined, nor at what time the discovery was made; but we take Ezekiel to be the earliest author in whom any mention of it is to be feen. Our learned readers will find a particular and full description of the various kinds of this machine in Vitruvius and Lipfius, whom at their leifure they may confult (2).

Now we are upon this subject, we shall here once for all give a short account of the catapulta and the balifia, two other engines frequently taken notice of by the ancient historians. The catapults was a machine out of which the Carthaginians, and other nations, fent vollies of darts and large arrows, made on purpose, upon the enemy, particularly upon those parties of garrisons posted on the ramparts, to prevent the enemy entering the breaches made by the rams. Diodorus intimates, that this engine was but of late invention at the fiege of Motya, Some authors confound this with the balifla, which was an engine out of which stones of a vast weight were discharged; for Diodorus writes, that the Carshaginians filled Lilybaum with catapules, out of which they threw stones; and Appian relates the same of the Roman catapults. But Lipsius (and he has reason on his side) makes them different machines, though he allows, that the satapulta discharged both stones and arrows. That author says, there were two sorts of catapults, the majores catapulta, and the minores; the first fent forth showers of darts and arrows of three cubits long, the other those of half that length. At the taking of new Carthage in Spain, an hundred and twenty large eatapults were found there, and two hundred and eighty-one of the smaller size. The Carthaginians always abounded with these engines: when Pyrrhus attacked Lilybaum, there was such an abundance of them at that place, that the walls would scarce contain them; and, a little before the destruction of their city, they delivered up to the Romans two thousand of them, according to Appian, or, as Strabo will have it, three thousand. The balista, as just hinted, was an engine out of which the autients threw stones of a prodigious magnitude: this was also used at sieges, and in many respects answered to the battering cannon of the moderns, only the balista, if we may depend upon the relations of the antients, seems to have been a machine of much greater force. According to Lipsius, the balista likewise was either major or minor; the major threw stones of three hundred and fixty pound weight, and the minor those of an hundred. Hegesippus relates feveral furprifing effects of this engine, which we have not time to take notice of. Livy tells us, that the Romans found at Carthoge twenty-two of the larger baliffa, and of the smaller firty-two. Ammianus Marcellinus, as explained and illustrated by Lipsius, gives an accurate account of the antiquity, use, form, and, in short, of every thing relating to these terrible engines, to which authors, for their further satisfaction, we must beg leave to refer our curious readers (3).

(2) Tertul, de Pal, Plin, Joseph, Vitruv. & Veget, apud Lipsium in poliorc, l. iii, dial. 1. & alib. Appian. in Libyc. Vitruv. l. x. c. 19. Ezek. iv. 1, 2. & xxi. 22. Plin l. vii. e. 56. Christ. Hendr. ubi sup. p. 468—475.
(3) Just. Lips. ubi sup. dial. 2. & 3. Vid. etiam Frid. Tsubmannum in Plaue. capt. att. iv. scen. ii. v. 16. Diod. Sic. in excerpt. l. xxii. c. 14. Appian. in Libyc. p. 46. Liv. l. xxvi. c. 47. Ammian. Marcellin. l. xxiii. Hegesip. l. iii. c. 12. Vid. & Joseph. Laurentium de torment. c. 7, &c.

ing, and defend that part of the camp which lay most exposed, the Italian auxiliaries met with a great relistance. However, they behaved with such bravery, that they routed this body of troops, cut a great number of them in pieces, and advanced to the Caribaginian camp in good order, which they attacked with incredible fury. Had they been duly supported, they must have carried it, and thereby totally ruined the enemy. But Dionysius, at the head of the mercenaries, not finding himfelf able to advance with fufficient expedition through the streets of the city to their relief, the Siculi being too remote to afford them timely succour, and the garrison not daring to make an effectual fally by way of diversion, lest they should leave the walls too naked; the Carthaginians resuming their courage, and being relieved But is repulsed by a powerful supply of fresh troops, soon broke them, killed a thousand on the b

with great

spot, and forced the rest into a narrow pass within the lines. Here they must all have been inevitably cut off, had not a shower of darts, and other missive weapons from the fleet, favoured their retreat. The Sicilian foot, in the mean time, charged a large body of Africans with such resolution, that they put them to flight, and pursued them to their very trenches with great slaughter; but these Africans being foon reinforced by the Campanians, Iberians, and Carthaginians, who had routed the Italians, and thereby were at liberty to march this way, returned to the charge with greater fury than ever, and overpowering the Siculi, drove them back to the town, with the loss of fix hundred men. The horse finding the foot not able to withstand the efforts of the enemy, and seeing these advance on all sides in c order to furround them, retired likewise to the city with precipitation. Dionysius, with his mercenaries, perceiving the greatest part of his army thus rudely handled, thought proper also to retreat, and take shelter within the walls. After this unsuccessful attempt, he summoned a council of war, consisting of his particular friends, the refult of whose deliberations was, that, fince the enemy was so much superior to them in strength, it would be highly imprudent to put all to the issue of a battle; Which obliges and therefore, that the inhabitants should be persuaded to abandon their country, as the inhabitants the only means to fave their lives. In consequence of this, a trumpet was sent to to abandon the Imilcar, to desire a cessation of arms till the next day, in order, as was pretended, to bury the dead, but in reality to give the people of Gela an opportunity of making d their escape. Towards the beginning of the night, the bulk of the citizens left the place, and he himself, with the army, followed them about midnight. To amuse the enemy, he left two thousand men of his light-armed troops behind him, commanding them to make fires all night, and fet up loud shouts, as though the army remained still in the town. At day-break, these took the same rout as their companions, and pursued their march with great celerity. By these stratagems, Dionyfius preserved the inhabitants of Gela from all insults, and secured the retreat of his army r.

place.

Dionysius secures their retreat, and that of his army, by a firatagem.

then moves towards Canyfius.

Imilear finding the city deserted by the greatest part of its citizens, the garrison, and Syracusian army, immediately entered it, and either put to the sword or cru- e Imilcar plun- cified all he met with in it. He likewise thoroughly plundered it, in the same manner ders Gela, and as Agrigentum, and then moved with his forces towards Camarina. Dionysius had before drawn off the Camarineans with their wives and children to Syracuse, by apmarina, which prising them of Imilcar's speedy approach. Their city underwent the same fate with that of Gela. The manner in which it was abandoned, Diodorus Siculus describes in a most moving manner. But this, as well as what happened to Dionysius hereupon, may be feen at large in a former part of this history .

Imilcar, in the mean time, finding his army extremely weakened, partly by the casualties of war, and partly by a plague broken out in it, and not thinking himself in a condition to continue the war, fent a herald to Syracuse to offer terms of peace f to the conquered. His unexpected arrival was very acceptable to Dionysius, and a A peace con- treaty of peace was immediately concluded with the Carlbaginians. The articles of cluded betwixt it were; that the Carthaginians, besides their antient acquisitions in Sicily, should the Carthagi- fill possess the countries of the Sicani, the Selinuntines, the Himereans, and Agrigentines; that the people of Gela and Camarina should be permitted to reside in their respective cities, which yet should be dismantled, upon their paying an annual tribute to the Carthaginians; that the Leontini, Messains, and all the other Sicilians, should live according to their own laws, and preserve their own liberty and indea pendency, except the Syracustans, who should continue in subjection to Dionysius. These articles being ratified by both parties, Imilcar returned to Carthage, having lost above half of his army. The plague afterwards made dreadful havock in Africa, carrying off vast numbers both of the Carthaginians and their allies '.

BEFORE the Carthaginian army retired from Sicily, Imilear separated the Campanians from the other troops, and left them to defend his conquests in that island. It happened foon after, that Dionysius was reduced to such extremities by his subjects Dionysius in the Syracustans, that he was advised by his most intimate friends either to kill himself, imminent danor by one desperate effort force his way through the enemy's camp, and escape to those ger of loging the places which were subject to the Carthaginians. But Philistus (E) the historian, who, at Syracutes b for a considerable time, had supported Dionysius, opposed this advice, telling him, that he ought to resume his courage, and either maintain himself on the throne, or die in the attempt. The tyrant, falling in with the fentiments of Philistus, resolved to part with his life, rather than the power he had acquired. In confequence of this resolution, he dispatched an express privately to the Campanians, and by large offers prevailed upon them to march to his relief. By their assistance he soon extricated But delivered himself out of the difficulties in which he was before involved, and afterwards became from theuce by a scourge both to his own subjects and the Carthaginians ".

the Campa-

t Idem ibid. * Diop. Sic. 1. xiv. c. 3.

(E) This Philiss was, according to Suidas (1), the ion of Archonidas, or, as Paulanias calls him, Archomenidas, and scholar to the elegiac poet Euenus. He was particularly intimate with Dionysius, and above any other person instrumental in establishing that tyrant's power at Syracufe; for which reason he obtained the government of the citadel there. It is suggested by some, that he enjoyed too great a degree of familiarity with Dionysius's mother, tho' with his privity. However this may be, upon his marrying the daughter of Lepthies, brother to Dionyfius, without imparting his delign to that prince, he was banished by him, and retired to Adria. He was not permitted to return as long as the tyrant lived; but in the time of Dionysius the younger, those who opposed Dion had him recalled; for they were afraid, left Plato, by his eloquence and philo-fophy, should change the tyrant's mind, which they believed (2) so learned a man as Philistus would be able to prevent, especially as he was perfectly well acquainted with the manner of adapting himself to the tyrant's disposition. He answered their expectations; for, as foon as he was in favour, he opposed Place, and perfuaded Dienysius to expel Dion. after, Dion made war upon Dionyius, and befieged him in the castle of Syracuse. Philistus hastened to his assistance from Iappgia, with a strong squadron of (3) galleys, but had the missortune to be deseated. Ephorus says, he sell by his own hands, and is sollowed herein by Diodorus Siculus. But Timoniles, who lived with Dion from the beginning of these commentance informs up there was sales and commotions, informs us, that he was taken prifoner, and put to death; with whom Timens Sign-lus in the main agrees. Diodorus Siculus says, he was dened burial. He may justly be esteemed to have been a man of merit, if we consider his wit, his learning, his writings, and even his bravery, which will, in some measure, appear from the account of him in the history of Syracuse. Suidas (4) ascribes to him a treatise concerning oratory; Ægypeiaca, or the history of Egypt, in twelve books;
res Sicula, or the Sicilian history, in eleven books; some orations, and one amongst the rest against Tricaranus, concerning the city of Naucrasis; the hi-flory of Dionysius the tyrant; three books about the theology of the Egyptians; and a treatife concerning Liéya and Syria. Cicero (5) highly celebrates his learning and diligence. His Sicilian history was the work in greatest esteem, of which, according to Diodorus Siculus (6), there were two parts. first consisted of seven books, including the transactions of eight hundred years, and concluding with the third year of the ninety-third olympind, when the Carthaginians took Agrigentum. The other begins where the first left off, that is, at the time when Dionysius the elder began his reign over the Syracusians, which was the year after the taking of Agrigentum. According to Cicero (7), he took great pleafure in imitating Thueydides; and, if Quintilian (8) may be credited, exceeded him in perspicuity. Dionysius Halicarnas-seus (9) made him too much inserior to Thucydides. However, all are agreed, that he much refembled him in the concilencis of his style. He affected this so much, that, if Them (10) may be believed, he avoided digressions to an excess. Timeus abused him; but Ephorus extelled him up to the skies; for which they are both centured by Plutarch (11). His works, as well as those of Ephorus and Timans Siculus, are all intirely loft. Had Philistus's Sicilian history, and his treatise concerning Libya, been extant, we should undoubtedly have met with many curious particulars relating to the building of Carthage, the first formation, growth, and decay of the Carthaginian state; in short, of all the principal transactions in which it was concerned, from its earliest ages to his time. This is not only probable from the titles of those pieces, but likewise from a hint given us by (12) Enseins and Appian. Notwithstanding he wrote a history during his banishment, he did not shew any resentment against Dionysius in it, but, on the contrary, flattered him, and concealed his vices. This conduct Pausanias (13)

endeavours to excuse, or at least to palliate, by saying, that the motive to it was a delire to be recalled to Syracuse. Some believe Philistus to have been born at Naucratis, others at Syracuje, and lastly, others believe there were two historians of that name, one of whom was born at Naucrati:, and the other at Syracuse. It is not very material which of these is in the right.

(1) Suid in Director, & Paufan in Eliac. l. v. Diod Sic. l. xiv. & xvi. & Plus. in Dion. ubi sup. (3) Idem ibid & Diod. Sic. l. xvi. (4) Suid. ubi sup. (5) Cic. a (6) Diod. Sic. l. xiii. (7) Cic. de orat. l. ii. (8) Quintil. l. x. c. 1. (5) Dionys. H Pomp. (10) Theon in programasm. c. 4. (11) Plut. ubi sup. (12) Euseb. in chron. a Vide & animadvers. Scaliger. in loc. Appian. in Libyc. sub init. (13) Pausan. in Assistant Superior of Vost. de bist. Grac. l. i. c. 6. (5) Cic. de divinat. l. i. (5) Dionyf. Halicarn. ep. ad (11) Eufeb. in chron. ad num. DCCCIV. (13) Pau an. in Attic. p. 25. Vide & Voss. de hist. Grac. l. i. c. 6. Vo L. VI. No 10.

HAVING

the Carthagi-

HAVING disarmed the inhabitants of Syracuse, and by that step fixed his sovereignty a farations for a there, he began to make the necessary preparations for renewing the war with the new war with Carthaginians; for he had struck up the late peace with Imilcar so suddenly, with no other view, than to amuse him till he had established his authority, and found himself in a condition to attack the Carthaginian conquests in Sicily with a powerful army. The motives that seem immediately to have prompted him to this war, were two: First, to prevent the future desertion of his subjects, many of whom retired every day with all their effects to the Carthaginian garrifons, as well as to recover those he had loft, fince he imagined, that, upon the breaking out of a rupture, the cruel treatment of the Carthaginians would drive them from thence. And secondly, the great prospect of success he had at that particular juncture, by reason of the deplorable ravages b the plague then made in the Carthaginian territories. As he knew the Carthaginians to be the most potent nation in the west, and that, if an opportunity offered, they would most certainly besiege Syracuse, he thought proper, by way of precaution, to fortify the hill Epipola, which commanded the town. This he did at a vall expence, with the affistance of sixty thousand freemen, and six thousand yoke of oxen. Diodorus tells us, that on this occasion the tyrant did not only superintend every part of the work, but frequently worked himself, enduring as much hardship and satigue as the poorest labourer; by which means the workmen were inspired with such a spirit of emulation and alacrity, that they laboured all day, and part of the night, and, which is almost incredible, in twenty days finished a wall thirty furlongs in length, c and of a proportionable height, which being flanked with high towers, placed at proper distances, and built of hewn stone, rendered the place almost impregnable w.

HAVING thus put his own city in a state of defence, he made preparations suitable to the undertaking he was going upon, being very sensible with how formidable a power he was foon to cope. His first care was to bring to Syracuse from all parts of Sicily, Greece, and Italy, great numbers of workmen, whom he employed in forging all forts of arms. As he found, that mercenaries came flocking in to him from all parts, his intention was to have them all armed after the manner of their respective countries, imagining that by this means they would be more capable of distinguishing themselves, and of striking a terror into the enemy. Not only the porches of the d temples, but the schools, walks, piazza's about the forum, and every public place, Artificers flock nay, even private houses, were filled with workmen. The great wages which Dioto him out of nysius paid them, induced the best artificers every-where to offer him their service. and foon enable He himself directed them in every thing relating to the form of the weapons they him to build a were to forge, and appointed the chief of the citizens to superintend them, with vastnumber of orders to promise great rewards to the diligent for their future encouragement. The fires, and to art of making engines to batter walls was, according to Diodorus, now first brought ous quantity of to Syracuse; but the artificer's name, to whom Dionysius was obliged for this, is nowhere told us. As he was ambitious of being superior to the Carthaginians by sea, he caused a vast quantity of timber for building his galleys to be brought from Italy, where it was drawn on carriages to the sea-side, and then shipped for Syracuse. Mount e Æina also supplied him with many fir and pitch trees, with which it then abounded. Having provided the necessary materials, he employed such a prodigious number of hands, that a fleet of two hundred fail was foon ready to put to sea; to which he added an hundred and ten old galleys, that were refitted. He likewise caused an hundred and fixty distinct receptacles to be made round the harbour, for sheltering his fleet from the weather, which would contain two ships a-piece; and after he had repaired an hundred and fifty old useless vessels, covered them with planks. The Syracusians themselves manned half of the long ships, and the foreigners, who had entered into Dionysius's service, the rest. In order to have his troops completely armed as foon as possible, Dionysius animated the artificers by his presence, by the f applauses he gave them, and by his bounty, in which all the diligent part of them all forss of arms.

And fortifies the hill Epimola.

shared. But his popular and winning behaviour excited more strongly, than any other circumstance, the industry and ardour of these people; for those who distinguished themselves, either by their ingenuity or application, were not only sure of receiving fome particular marks of his favour, but even fometimes had the honour to dine or sup with him. It is sno wonder therefore, that in a shorter time than can easily be conceived, besides an immense quantity of other arms, he had got ready an hundred a and forty thousand bucklers, the same number of swords and helmets, and sourceen thousand cuirasses, all of excellent workmanship. He had also prepared for service a large train of battering engines of all kinds, and an infinity of darts. As for landforces, besides his own subjects, many soldiers came from Italy, Greece, and other countries, to list in his service. We must not omit observing here, that Dionysius is faid by Diodorus to have invented the quinqueremes about this time, to which he was induced chiefly out of a defire, that the Syracufians should be thought to rival their ancestors in ingenuity; for being apprised, that the triremes, or three-oared vessels, were first made at Corinth, he was desirous the number of oars should be first inlarged by the Syracustans, a colony of the Corinthians x.

for pushing matters to extremity without delay y.

THE tyrant, having finished his military preparations both by sea and land, and finding his army in a condition to take the field, thought proper now to open his design to the Syracusians. In order to which he convened the senate, and communi- He acquaints cated his intention to them of attacking the Carthaginian territories instantly, and the Syraculians even without any previous declaration of war. In vindication of his conduct on this occasion, and to spirit up the assembly, he urged, that the Carthaginians were of all others the most implacable enemies to the Greek nation; that they had then nothing less in view than the conqueit of Sicily, and consequently the ruin of all the Greek cities therein; that they would have even been at the gates of Syracuse before that time, had not the plague obliged them to continue in a state of inaction; that as they were c then in a most deplorable condition, no finer opportunity could ever offer itself to the Syracustians of driving them out of the island than the present; and that lastly, if this was let flip, upon their recovering themselves, they would most certainly put their favourite scheme in execution, and deprive the Syracusians, as well as their neighbours, of every thing that was dear and valuable to them. The assembly, moved who approve of by so pathetic a speech, and influenced by the views of policy more than the dictates is. of juffice, readily concurred in his opinion. The antient hatred they bore the Carthaginian, their rage against them for having brought their city under the power of a tyrant, and the hopes they entertained of finding some opportunity of recovering their former liberty, united them in their suffrages, and war was unanimously resolved on. d If they were victorious, they doubted not carrying their point; and if worsted, the tyrant would be so much asraid of a foreign enemy, that he would learn to treat his subjects at home with more moderation. In short, as they sansied themselves to have a prospect of bettering their condition, however the war might turn out, they were

UPON the breaking up of the affembly, Dionyfius, in conformity to the disposi- He falls upon tion of the Syracustans, gave up to the fury of the populace the persons and posses- the Carthagifions of the Carthaginians, who then refided in Syracuse, and there traded on the nians in Sicily. faith of treaties. As there were many of their ships at that time in the harbour, laden previous declawith cargoes of great value, the people immediately plundered them, and, not con-ration of war. e tented with this, ransacked all their houses in a most outrageous manner: and this horrid example of persidiousness and inhumanity was followed throughout the whole island of Sicily; nay, the Greeks inhabiting the cities under the jurisdiction of the Carthaginians, not fatisfied with stripping them of their effects, thought themselves sufficiently authorized to treat the bodies of those miserable wretches with the utmost

ignominy and barbarity, to inflict every kind of punishment upon them, in return for the cruelties they had formerly exercised on the natives of the country. This was the bloody signal of the war that Dionysius now entered into with the Carthagi-

IT has been above observed, that great numbers of mercenaries flocked to Diony- Great numbers f sus from Greece, Italy, and several other countries. The great pay he offered, drew of foreign merthem over in crouds; but no foreign power contributed so much to his support in his service. as the Lacedamonians. From Sparta he received as many recruits as were necessary for the completing of his troops, which, because he apprehended the war with Carthage would be long and bloody, he refolved should be very numerous. That he might be intirely at liberty to act against the common enemy with all his forces, he concluded a peace with the Rhegians and M. flanians. To engage the latter the more He concludes a firmly in his interests, he ceded to them a large extent of territory. This he judged peace with the Rhegians and M. flanians, being a sea staring Rhegians and not ill bestowed at such a critical juncture; for the Messanians, being a sea faring Messanians.

mention, as far as we can find, of the alliance between the Persians and the Cariba- a

Battles of Himis fought the Herodotus farther informs us, that the battle of Himera was fought the same day mera and Sala- with that of Salamis; but Diodorus Siculus will have the Carthaginians to have been defeated the same day that Leonidas, with his brave body of Spartans, perished at Thermopyla. Upon which he makes this reflection: "The gods on purpose seemed " to have destined the Greeks at the same time a glorious victory in one place, and a " most honourable death in another q."

Gelon rewards Sheir bravery.

THE first thing after the battle Gelon did, was amply to reward all those who had this foldiers for fignalized themselves in the action, especially the body of horse, to whom the victory was chiefly owing. The greatest part of the spoils, which were of an immense b value, he offered to the gods, adorning with them the temples of Syracuse and Himera. What remained, together with the captives, he distributed amongst his foldiers, in proportion to the degree of bravery and valour they had shewn. Many of the last, to whatever city's share they fell, were employed in public works for the common good; and so many were taken, that all Africa seemed to have been transplanted into Sicily. Some of the citizens of Agrigentum in particular, who had diftinguished themselves above the rest, had five hundred a-piece. The sugitives, upon the defeat of their army, being in the utmost consternation, sled into the inland provinces of Sicily, especially the territory of Agrigentum, where being taken alive, that city was in a manner filled with prisoners. The greatest part of them were put c in irons, and set apart for the public service. The work they were chiefly employed in at first, was cutting and hewing of stone; of which afterwards they built the largest of the temples at Agrigentum, and made those conduits or aqueducts to convey water from the city, which were fo much admired by the antients, and called Pheaces, from one Pheax, who was the overfeer of the work. The Agrigentines likewife, by their labour, funk a fish-pond at great expence, seven stadia in circumserence, and twenty cubits deep (B).

'Gelon compared to the most famous Greek commanders.

By the late victory, which was complete both in itself and its consequences, Gelon acquired great glory, and was justly celebrated by foreigners as well as his own subjects, as one of the most renowned and experienced generals any age or nation ever produced. d The stratagem by which the Carthaginian army was overthrown he himself contrived, and conducted throughout, being the life and foul of the army in the execution of it. Some authors have not scrupled to prefer him to Themistocles, and the advantage accruing to the Greek nation in general from this action to that gained by the battle of Platea. However this may be, it is certain we find no account in history of any engagement, wherein the like carnage was made, and such a number of prisoners taken. Neither did the Carthaginian fleet, consisting of that vast number of ships of war and transports above-mentioned, meet with a much better fate than their land-forces had done. Only twenty long ships or galleys, which Hamiltar had occasionally drawn out for necessary services, happened to be out at sea, when the camp of the marines was taken, and consequently escaped the general constagration. These failed directly for Carthage; but meeting with contrary winds and tempests, before they reached that place, they were all cast away, a few men only being saved These arriving at Carthage, brought the dismal news of the intire in a fmall boat. defeat of their army, and the loss of their fleet. The Carthaginians, little expecting to hear of such a signal disaster, but on the contrary pleasing themselves with the imagination of reducing the whole island of Sicily almost without striking a stroke, were most strangely shocked at receiving this melancholy advice. As in all great reverses of fortune the nation we are discoursing of ever lost their courage, and abandoned themselves to despair, so in the present case they gave every thing up for lost. I Nothing but outcries and lamentations were to be heard throughout the whole city;

> P Idem ibid. DIOD. Sic. & HERODOT. ubi fup. r Dion. Sic. ubi fup,

(B) This famous pond, the effect of Carthaginian labour, was supplied with water both from soun-tains and rivers, and excellently well stocked with fish of all kinds, serving both for food and pleasure. Great numbers of swans likewise rested upon it, which afforded a most pleasant prospect to the eye.

By the negligence of succeeding ages, it was gradually filled up with mud, and at last became wholly dry ground. The foil was so rich in Diodorn's time, that the Agrigentines planted vines and all kinds of trees there, which brought them in a very considerable revenue (1).

a the enemy was already imagined to be at their gates, and all orders and degrees of people amongst them were overwhelmed with inexpressible grief, despondency, and consternation.

In this deplorable situation, the Carthaginians thought they could have recourse to The Carthagia nothing but Gelon's clemency; and therefore immediately dispatched embassadors to nians apply to Sicily injoining them to thisk up a peace with him upon any terms.

Sicily, injoining them to strike up a peace with him upon any terms. UPON the arrival of these embassadors at Syracuse, Gelon afforded them an instance His moderation of great moderation and humanity. Notwithstanding by the late victory he was become and humanity. the arbiter of peace and war, and had the Carthaginians intirely at his mercy, he received these ministers in a most assable and courteous manner. His prosperity had not in the b least elated him, nor rendered him at all haughty or untractable. On the other hand, tho' this deputation consisted of persons the most samed of any in Carthage for their merit and abilities, yet they behaved in a most mean and abject manner. They threw themselves at Gelon's feet, with tears begged him to receive their city into favour, and grant them a peace upon what conditions he should think proper to prescribe. This plainly shews how void the Carthaginians then were of that true resolution and magnanimity, which supported the old Romans in all adversity, and carried them through all dangers; that refolution and magnanimity, which enabled them to lay the foundations of an almost universal empire, and even to destroy the dangerous rival of theirs we are now writing the history of; though it must be owned this heroic virtue and c greatness of soul was much tarnished in their posterity, to say no worse, by some actions they were guilty of towards the decline of the Carthaginian state.

Gelon, like a good-natured prince, being touched with compassion for the miseries The terms on of the Carthaginians, granted them a peace upon the following easy conditions: First, which he that they should pay two thousand talents of filver towards defraying the expences of grants them a the war. Secondly, that they should build two temples, where this treaty of peace should be deposited, and at all times be exposed to public view. Thirdly, that for the future they should abstain from offering human facrifices. This last article shews the great humanity of Gelon's temper, and is a proof, that the people of Carthage were obliged a fecond time to abolish that barbarous practice for a certain period, at d least in appearance; for it cannot be doubted but they ratified this treaty, it being so advantageous to them, at a juncture when they were upon the very brink of destruction.

THE Carthaginians, having recovered their spirits, by the happy turn their affairs had taken, through the conqueror's great clemency and moderation, thought proper now to shew their gratitude to Damareta, Gelon's wife, who had forwarded an accommodation betwixt the two powers, and been chiefly instrumental in bringing it to a happy conclusion. They therefore, immediately after the peace, sent her a crown of gold, valued at an hundred talents of that metal. This crown Gelon turned into money, and coined pieces, called from his wife's name Damaretia, each of them being worth e ten Attic drachma's. The Sicilians gave them the name of Pentecontalitra, from their being fifty pounds in weight (C).

WE must not omit one circumstance, which may serve as a further instance of An inflance of Gelon's military capacity. Upon his first approach to Himera, to succour the Gelon's mili-besieged, a detachment of his forces deseated many of the Carthaginian parties sent tary capacity. to forage in different parts of the island. Besides what they killed, they took ten thousand prisoners, as above related. These probably were the worst troops in the Carthaginian army; and therefore a stratagem Frontinus relates Gelon to have been the author of, feems to bid fair for this particular period of time. This prince,

Idem ibid. & Prut. apopth. 175. & de fer. vindic. deor. p. 552. Vide & fehol. Pind. ad Pyth. od. 2. pecnon Jac. Perizon. comment. in Ælian. var. hist. l. vi. c. 11.

(C) These pieces seem to have been rather medals struck on occasion of Gelon's victory over the Carthaginians, than common coins. The size of Carthaginians, than common coins. them supplies us with an argument in favour of this notion. The brass liters of sicily was at first a pound weight, as the librs or as was amongst the Romans; and fixty such liter made a talent. According to Pollux, Damareta, and the other Syracular ladies of distinction because all their successions. custan ladies of distinction, brought all their silver utenfils to the mint, and the coin formed from thence was called νόμισμα Δημαρέτιαν. dorus's relation is more probable; fince, if Gelon had been in great want of money, he would undoubt-edly have flamped it in the smallest species, and not in pieces of such a magnitude, which seemed to allude to the great victory obtained over the Carthaginians, as well as the immense booty found in their camp (2).

having a large number of prisoners, picked out the weakest of them, who were a auxiliaries, mostly tawny, and of a very despicable appearance; and exposed them quite naked before his foldiers, that they might have the most contemptible notion of the enemy. Something like this happened, if we mistake not, in the late war betwixt the Turks and the Russians, when the former, to give their people at Constantinorle the meaner opinion of the latter, led the most miserable of the captives they had taken from that nation in triumph through their capital.

What use Gelon made of the Carthaginian Spoils.

Besides the public works above-mentioned, the Carthaginian spoils enabled Gelon to build two noble temples, the one to Ceres, and the other to Proferpina. A tripod of gold likewise, of sixteen talents, he caused to be made out of them, and sent it as a donation to the temple of Apollo at Delphi, as an acknowledgment of his grati- b tude to that deity. If an inscription given us by the scholiast on Pindar may be depended upon as genuine, there were more tripods than one fent thither on this occasion in the name of Gelon and his brothers, who had all of them a great share in the successes they gave thanks for (D).

Gisco, the fon of Hamilton, banished Carthage.

THE Carthaginians, incensed at Hamilear, as imputing the late disaster intirely to his conduct, notwithstanding the great services he had done the state on other occafions, refolved, that his family should feel the effects of their refentment; and therefore banished his son Gisco, who, being thus obliged to leave his native country, retired to Selinus, where he died for want of necessaries. The Sicilian cities, that sided with the Carthaginians, upon their first application to Gelon, were received into savour, and c had a confirmation of all their antient privileges granted them, though the conqueror, with a very good grace, might have treated them in a far different manner ".

Little faill of the Circhagimians for feventy years.

FROM this time for full seventy years, that is to say, till towards the close of the ninety-fecond, or the beginning of the ninety-third olympiad, we scarce find any mention of the Carthaginians, or their affairs, in the Sicilian history. The last blow they received in Sicily was fo terrible, that a peace of some duration was absolutely necessary for the re-establishment of their affairs; and it is natural to suppose, that, of all places in the world, Sicily would be the last they would, for a considerable period of time, chuse for the scene of action. However, a fair opportunity offering at the time above-mentioned, moved by their ambition, they embarqued in another war d there, which, though pretty bloody and expensive, ended with much better success to them than the former.

The Carthaginians render themselves independent in Africa.

However, in some part of this interval, several remarkable incidents, mentioned by Justin, Sallust, and Valerius Maximus, seem to have happened. The Carthaginians carried their arms against the Moors, Numidians, and other African nations, and greatly extended their frontiers in Africa. They likewise shook off the tribute, which, for a long time, had given them fo much uneafinefs, and rendered themselves absolutely inde-

Have warm diffutes with regulation of limits.

THEY had warm disputes with the people of Cyrene, a Mediterranean city, the capital of Cyrenaica, built by the Theraans under Battus, who were a colony of the the Cyreneans, Lacedamonians, which arose from the want of a regulation of limits between the two e on account of a states. As the Cyreneans were very powerful, much blood was shed on this occasion; but at last the two nations, after having almost exhausted each other by a long and expensive war, accommodated their differences in the following manner x.

> * FRONTIN. l. i. c. 11, 18. " DIOD. Sic. l. xiii. ÆLIAN. var. hift. l. vi. c. 11. * SAL. Jug. c. 79.

(D) We 'are further affured by Pausanias, that Gelon fent several valuable presents to the temple of Juticer Olympius at Olympia, as a grateful return to that pagan divinity for the good success that attended his arms, with which he was furnished from the booty found in the Carthaginian camp. Among the rest there were three curious vestments of fine Carthaginian linen, each of them representing a coat of mail, which undoubtedly were looked upon as fomething particularly rare, fince Xenophon intimates the Carthaginian flax to have been of a very fine nature. A statue of Jupiter also, of a prodigious size, was sent to the same place in the name of Gelon and the Syracusians, when they were full of the most grateful sentiments for the signal victory obtained over the Carthaginians both by sea and land. Both these donations were of exquisite workmanship, being done by those celebrated artificers Pothaus, Antiphilus, and Megaeles, at Gelon's order. Belides the golden tripod above-mentioned, Gelon fent a golden statue of Victory to Delphi, which feems to have been the third offering of that metal ever brought thither. This we learn from Phanias, Erefius, and Theopompus, as cited by Athenaus, who inform us, that before the days of Gyges and Crasfus, kings of Lydia, all the votive gifts tent to Delthi confilled of brass, and these not statues, but chaldrons and tripods. As this observation seemed to us curious, we could not prevail upon ourselves to omit it (4).

(4) Pausan in Eliac. poster. l. vi. p. 379. ed. Hanov. 1613. Xenoph. de venat p. 975. ed. Leunclav, Frances.

1594. Phan. Eres. & Theopomp, apud Athen, in deipnosoph, l. vi.

Being so weakened, that they were both afraid of becoming a prey to some foreign invader, they confented first to a cessation of arms, in order to a pacification Afterwards it was agreed, that each city should appoint two commissaries, who But at last should set out from their respective towns upon the same day, and that the spot they come to a met upon should be the common boundary to both states. Upon this, two brothers, acommodation. called Philani, were dispatched from Carthage, who advanced with great celerity, whilst the Cyreneans proceeded more slowly. Whether this was to be imputed to the laziness of the latter, or to some accident intervening, is not certain. However, the last is not improbable, fince in those sandy regions, at certain seasons of the year, there are as violent storms and tempests as upon the sea; which is not to be wondered b at, considering, that in such countries, which are open and level, and have not so much as a shrub to break the force of the wind, sometimes boisterous weather must almost necessarily happen; and then the sand, being put into a violent commotion, is blown up into the air in great quantities, fills the eyes, mouths, nostrils, &c. of travellers, and by that means greatly retards at least, if it does not put an intire stop to their journey. Valerius Maximus intimates, that the Philani acted perfidiously, by fetting out before the appointed time, and thereby imposed upon the others. Be this as it will, the Cyreneans, finding themselves too tardy, and fearing to be called to an account for their conduct at their return home, accused the Carthaginians of breach of faith, by beginning their journey before the stipulated time; insisted, that the e convention agreed upon between their principals was broken; and declared they would fuffer all extremities, rather than fubmit to fuch a base and ignominious treatment. On the other hand, the Philani, with much ferming calmness and moderation, defired the Cyreneans not to talk in so losty a strain, but themselves to propose some expedient, whereby their differences might be terminated, promiting at the same time to submit to it, whatever it might be. The latter then proposed to them, either to retire from the place they had fixed upon for the limit of their dominions, or fuffer themselves to be buried alive there, not in the least imagining they would comply with so hard a condition. But herein they were disappointed; for the Carthaginian brothers, without hesitation, consented to it, laid down their lives, and gained The Philani a large extent of territory by that means to their country. The Carthaginians ever suffer them afterwards celebrated this as a most brave and heroic action, paid them divine honours, felves to be buand endeavoured to immortalize their names, by erecting there two altars, with order to inlarge fuitable inscriptions upon them. Strabo informs us, that no traces of these were to the dominions be seen in his days, tho' the place still retained the name of the altars of the Philani. of their state. However, 'tis not to be doubted but the state of Carthage, as long as it existed, kept them up, this being ever their boundary on the side of Cyrenaica. Sallust relates, that there was a fandy tract of ground betwixt the territories of Carthage and Cyrene, without hill, river, or spot in it, whereby to ascertain the borders of the two nations; so that they were obliged to have recourse to the method aforesaid. The love of one's e country is certainly a most amiable virtue; but that any civilized nation should carry this fo far, as to allow the building of it upon fraud, perfidy, and a violation of public faith, is very strange; yet this the Carthaginians did, if Valerius Maximus may be credited, by paying so high a regard to the memory of the Philani. That author however runs out into a wild and frantic encomium upon them, and thereby discovers much of the Punic disposition. In short, this piece of history gives us a lively idea of the Carthaginian notion of bravery and heroism, as do several other incidents to be found in the course of this history ".

THE Egestines, allies of the Athenians, after the conclusion of the Syracusian war, The Egestines of which they had been the principal occasion, by inviting the Athenians into Sicily, occasion ano-f entertained strong apprehensions of being called to an account by the Syracusians for ther war beall the acts of hostility they had committed against them. About this time also the thaginians and Egestines had some disputes with the Selinuntines about a regulation of limits, which Syracusians. at last broke out into an open rupture betwixt the two states; but the former dreading the refentment of the Syracusians, and believing they would affift their enemy with a large body of forces, clapped up a peace with the latter upon their own terms. Though by this peace the Egestines gave up all the points in dispute, the Selinuntines, not contented herewith, made farther encroachments upon them; which greatly irritating the Egestines, they had recourse to the Carthaginians, imploring their pro- 2 tection, both against the Selinuntines, and their confederates the Syracusians. affair meeting with great difficulties, it was for some time debated at Carthage what course it would be proper to take. On the one hand, the Carthaginians were very desirous to possess themselves of Egesta, a city which lay so convenient for them, and which would much facilitate the reduction of the whole island of Sicily, the favourite project this state always had in view. On the other, they dreaded the power and forces of Syracuse, which had so lately cut to pieces a numerous army of the Albenians, and was become, by so shining a victory, more formidable than ever. At last their thirst after empire prevailed, and, through the desire of getting the city into their hands, they promised the Egestines succours.

Idem ibid. Strab. l. iii. Pomp. Mel. 1. i. c. 7. Valer. Max. l. v. c. 6. Vide & Cellar. geogr. ant. l. iv. c. 3.

Hannibal abpointed to com-

THE general appointed to command in this war, if matters came to the last extremity, was Hannibal, the grandson of Hamilear, killed at the battle of Himera, and Sicilian expedi- fon of Gisco, the exile above-mentioned. He was at this time invested with the highest dignity of the state, being one of the suffeces, and a person of very great confideration. As he bore a natural hatred to all the Greeks, and was defirous to wipe off, by his own valour, the difgrace of that defeat, which he confidered as a stain upon his family, he fought, by all means possible, to distinguish himself on this occasion for the service of his country. He was indefatigable all that summer, and the ensuing winter, in raising forces, not only in Africa, but in Spain and Italy, and making the other necessary preparations; infomuch that, in the beginning of the c fpring, he had an incredible number of foldiers of different nations lifted under his standard. But, before he came to an open rupture with the Selinuntines, he had recourse to Panic policy, endeavouring, by a trick of his, to over-reach both them and the Syracujians their allies. Being apprifed, that the Selinuntines were not fatiffied with the tract of land ceded them by the Egestines in the last treaty of peace, but laid farther claim to a great part of their territories, he defired the Syracufians to act as mediators in this affair, and endeavour to accommodate the differences betwixt the contending parties in an amicable manner. His view in this was, to fow the feeds of diffention betwixt the Syracufians and the Selinuntines, imagining, that if the latter should reject the mediation of the former, the confederacy betwirt them would of d course be diffolved, and consequently that each of them would more easily fall a prey to the Carthaginians. But his scheme proved abortive; for though the Syracusians interposed their good offices, in order to bring about an accommodation betwixt the Selinuntines and Egestines, yet finding these inestectual, they did not think proper to make use of any compulsive methods, nor to renounce the alliance they had entered into with the former. The Carthaginians, finding their artifices thus eluded, upon the return of their embasfadors, openly espoused the cause of the Egestines, and sent a fupply of five thousand Africans, and eight hundred Campanians, to their affiltance. The latter had been hired by the Cha cidians to affilt the Albenians against the Syracustians; but, after their overthrow, sailing back into Campania, staid there, in hopes & that fome state might soon stand in need of their assistance. Accordingly, the Carthaginians took them into their service, bought them horses, and placed them in garison at Egesta; which place, at all events, they were determined to make themfelves mafters of. Notwithstanding this powerful body of Carthaginian auxiliaries, the Selinuntines, being both rich and numerous, held the Egestines in great contempt w.

The Carthagi. Campanians sand of them.

THE Selinuntines, having drawn together a strong body of regular troops, ravaged all the country about Egesta, and despising the enemy, who were far inferior to them surprise the Se- in number, dispersed themselves in parties, without order or discipline, all over the linuatines, and territory of the Egestines, for the sike of plunder. The Carthaginians and Campanians f ent off athon- in garifon, observing this, took the first opportunity that offered, in conjunction with the Egestines, of surprising them; which they did so effectually, that they put them to flight, killed a thousand on the spot, and carried off all their baggage. Immediately after this action, both cities dispatched embassadors to solicit succours from their respective confederates, the Selinuntines from the Syracusians, and the Egestines from the Carthaginians; which being readily agreed to on both fides, a most dreadful war broke out between the Egestines and Carthaginians on one hand, and the Selinuntines and Syracusians on the other.

THE Carthaginians, before they directly engaged in this war, took care to make The Carthagian estimate of the prodigious sums necessary to support it, and the numerous body of nians make forces requisite to carry it on with vigour; and having impowered their general Han-tions for a war nibal to raise an army equal to the undertaking, as above-mentioned, and to equip a with the Selifuitable fleet, they appropriated certain funds to the defraying all the expences of the nuntines. war, intending to attack the island of Sicily with their whole power the beginning of the following fpring.

Hannibal, at the time appointed, put his army on board fixty long galleys, and Hannibal lands fifteen hundred transports, together with an immense quantity of provisions he had his forces in Siamassed for their subsistence, military engines, arms, and all other things necessary cily.

b for a fiege. Setting fail with these, as soon as the season would permit, he crossed the African sea, and arrived at Lilybæum, a promontory of Sicily, opposite to the coast of Africa. Before he landed his troops, he was discovered by a party of Selinumine horse, who posted away with great expedition, to give their countrymen intelligence of the approach of the enemy. Upon this the Selinuntines dispatched couriers to Syracuse for immediate relief. Hannibal in the mean time, landing his army, marked out a camp, beginning at a place called The well of Lilybæum, where the city of Lilybeum was afterwards built. Here he staid a short time to refresh his troops, before he entered upon the operations of the campaign.

According to Ephorus the historian (E), the Carthaginian army confisted of two Ephorus and hundred thousand foot, and four thousand horse, though Timœus Siculus (F) will not Timœus Siculus

lus differ in allow their relations

(E) Ephorus, an orator and historian, was born in the city (1) of Cuma or Cyme in Zolia, and one of Isocrates's (2) scholars. His history contained chiefly the transactions of his countrymen the Greeks for the space of seven hundred an i fifty years; that is, from the return of the Heraclide, to the twentieth year of Philip king of Macedon (3), in which year he belieged Perinthus. Plurarch intimates (4), that he wrote a particular history of Cuma. He was a writer of flow parts, according to Tully, and much inferior, in point of genius (5), to his school-sellow Theopompus. Seneca says (6), he had little regard to veracity; which feems confirmed by most of the passages taken from him by Diodorus. norance in geography is very apparent, from his making all the Iberians inhabitants of the fame city; from whence fosephus rightly infers (7), that the knowledge of the western parts of the world came very late to the Greeks. Notwithstanding what has been faid, Diodorus informs us (8), that he wrote with great accuracy, and in an elegant flyle; tho' in the last article he is contradicted by Duris Samius (9), and Dion Chryscstomus, whose testimony is of great weight in this particular. His grand history he divided into thirty books (10), to each of which he added a preface. Besides the performances above-mentioned, he composed a treatise de rebus inventis, of which Strabo(11) takes notice; another de bonis & malis, divided (12) into twenty-four books; another de rebus passim admirabilibus (13), divided into fifteen books; another de civitatibus Thracia, of which Harpocration quotes (14) the fourth book. Father Harduin afcribes to him a particular treatise (15) of the origin of cities, and another of the increase of the Nile; but, according to M. Bayle (16), the authors alleged by him prove no fuch thing; and indeed this he makes out very

Œ.

X

偶

j.

clearly. Ephorus is complimented (17) by Polybius and of the Cartha-Strabo; but notwithstanding Diodorus seems so tond ginian army. of him, yet, in another pullige, that writer rells us, he related so many fulfities (18) of Egypt, that we must not expect to meet with any thing of truth in him. Dio ysius Halicarnasseus (19), as well as Diodorus, speaks tavourably of his style. The two other historians this last author ranks with him, are Theopompus (20) and Callishenes. We find a valuable frag-ment of Porphyry preferved by Eusehius, from which it appears, that Ephorus was accused of being a plagiary; nay, of stealing three thouland lines (21), word for word. from Daimachus, Anaximenes, and Cal-listhenes. Lysimachus is said to have written a piece, containing all his plagiarisms; and Alcaus. (22) a fatirical poet, is affirmed by Porphyry likewife to have exposed them. He is ridiculed by Strabo (23) for the mention he makes of his native country. A fon, called Demophilus, survived him, who 24), being a scholar, was thought by some to have put the finishing hand to what his father left imperfect. A fuller account of him may be seen in Vessius (25), and M. Bayle, to whom we refer our readers.

(F) Timzus Siculus, a Greek historian of good note (26), the son of Andromachus, a noble Sicilian, who, according to Diodorus (27), assembling the fugitives of Naxus, fettled with them on a hill called Taurus, to which fettlement the city of Taurominium owed its origin. Timaus flourished in the time of Agathocles, and Ptolemy Philadelphus. Suidas and Hesychius will not allow him to have been a judicious compiler of history; and Polybius accuses him of betraying too great credulity, a want of judgment, and a trifling genius, on several occasions (28). He was a person of violent passions, as appeared both from his shameful calumnies, and impious flattery,

(1) Strab. l. xiii. p. 428. (2) Plut. in vit. Isocrat. p. 837. (3) Diod. Sic. l. iv. & l. xx. (4) Plut. de vit. Homer. sub init. (5) Cic. in Brut. Quintil. l. ii. c. 9. (6) Senec. quast. natural. l. vii. c. 16. Vide Plut. in Dio. Phot. bibl. 245, &c. (7) foseph. cont. Apion. l. i. (8) Diod. Sic. l. v. sub init. (9) Duris Samius in hist. l. i. apud Phot. bibl. 176. Dion Chrysost. in orat. de dicend. exercit. (10) Diodor. Sicul. l. xvi. (11) Strab. ubi supra. (12) Suid. in Exos. (13) Idem ibid. (14) Harpocrat. voce Alv. (15) Hardain. in judic. austor. Plin. (16) Bayle, in dist. bist. &crit. (17) Polyb. apud Strabon. l. x. & alib. (18) Diod. Sic. l. i. (19) Dionys. Hailicar. de col. verb. c. 81. (20) Diod. Sic. l. iv. (21) Porphyr. de erud. audit. apud Euseb. in prap. evang. l. x. (22) Idem ibid. (23) Strab. ubi supra. (24) Conf. Fonsium de script. hist. philos. p. 43, 44. cum Athen. in deipnosoph. l. vi. (25) Voss. de hist. Grac. & Bayle, ubi supra. (26) Athen. deipnosoph. l. ii. & alib. (27) Diod. Sic. l. xvi. c. 7. (28) Hesych. & Suid. in Tiual.

allow them to have been much above an hundred thousand. Hannibal, after landing a his forces, caused all his ships to be drawn ashore, for fear of giving umbrage to the Syracusians, and then, being joined by the Egestines, marched to Selinus, which city he immediately caused to be invested, and began to batter the walls with incre-

Hinnibal lays Juge to Selinus.

> which prejudiced many writers, and some of these even too much, against him. Because he was banished by Agathocles, he gave that tyrant no quarter after his death, not only describing his crimes and ill qualities in the blackest manner, but loading him with fitulous calumnies. He was acted to much by a spirit of revenge on this occasion, that he contradicted himselt in a most flagrant manner; for which (29) reason, the five last books of his hiflory, which treated of the act ons of Agathocles, were undoubtedly very deficient in point of veracity. On the other hand, if we may believe Suidas, he exalted his hero Timoleon (30) to a superiority above the highest divinities; to which that author adds, that for this he deserved a greater punishment than Callifthenes, who suffered death for deligning to deity Alexander a prince infinitely more illustrious than Timoleon. He composed several pieces; one confitting of three books, de Syria, & ejus urbibus regibusque; another divided into fixty-eight books, de argumentis rhetorica; another intituled olympionica, seu acta chronica; two more, whose titles were, Ἰταλικά κ) Σικελικά, consisting of eight books; and Έλληνικά καὶ Σικελικά, whose number of books is not known. In the former of these two last works he wrote the history of Sicily, as far as it was coincident with the Roman history; and in the other he gave an account of the Sicilian transactions, as they were intermixed with those of the Greeks. His history of Pyrrhus was a distinct piece, as we are informed by Dionysius Halicarnasfews and Cicero (31). Diogenes Lucrius quoted no book of his history beyond the eighteenth, though Atheneus (32) cited the twenty-eighth; which is a proof, that those authors paid no great regard to the divition of his Greek, Roman and Sicilian history, as given us by Vessius. Notwithstanding what has been offered by Suidas to invalidate the authority of Timans in the five last books of his history, yet this author himself allows (33), that, in all other parts of it, he adhered strictly to truth; and even according to Polybius, though he blames our historian in several respects, particularly for trusting too much to the reports of others, he laid it down as a maxim (34), that truth was the life and foul of history. However he might be imposed upon in what related to Africa, Corsica, and other countries that he was a stranger to, as Polybius intimates he was (35), yet we cannot help being of opinion, that he was an excellent and most faithful historian as to the Sicilian affairs, except when he discharged all the impetuous torrents of his rage against Agathocles, which indeed could never be vindicated. In most of those passages of Diodorus, wherein Timaus and Ephorus are cited as differing in their relations, the former has apparently a much greater degree of probability on his fide, of which we shall at prefent only give one inftance, not having time to produce all the reft: Ephorus informs us, that the Carthaginian army, which reduced Selinus, confifted of two hundred thousand foot, and four thousand horse; but, according to Timeus, it could not well have confifted of above an hundred and ten, or an hundred and twenty thouland men. Now, it is evident from Diodorus, that upon Hannibal's marching to Himera, immediately after the reduction of Selinus, his army confisted but of an hundred thousand men; for he was joined by twenty thousand Sicani on his march. and, upon his arrival before Himera, his army, including both camps, amounted but to an hundred and twenty thousand men. Since therefore we cannot well suppose the Carthaginians to have loft above ten or twenty thousand men before Selinus, because the fiege of that place was a very short one, it will follow, that when Hannibal first invested Selinus, his army, in all probability, confifted of about an hundred and ten, or an hundred and twenty thousand men, nearly as Timaus related. It is certain Diodorus very well agrees with this historian; for that author tells us, Hannibal's army, upon his laying fiege to Himera, amounted to an hundred and twenty thoufand men, as above-mentioned. However therefore in words he may have extolled Ephorus, and depreciated Timeus, yet, in fact and reality, he, in this place, as well as feveral others that might be recited, preferred the latter to the former. Both Diodorus and Cicero (36) celebrated his learning and eloquence, the last of which was of the Affatic kind. Pintarch (37) entertained different sentiments of his ftyle; and Longinus censures him for his affectation and puerility therein, as well as the eager delire he fhews to reprehend the vices of others, while he is blind to his own. However, M. Bayle has plainly proved, that the inflances (38) produced by Longinus in support of his criticism, do not come up to the point, and that he deserved censure in this particular, rather than Timans. Longinus owned, that fometimes he came up to the lofty and fublime ftyle, had a great share of knowledge, and expressed himself very judiciously; but still he seems to us to have been so much prejudiced against our historian, on account of the numerous inftances of ill-nature visible in the latter part of his work, that he had rather too strong a disposition to discover blemishes in him; which made him copy after Cecilius in finding imaginary faults, and thereby fall into the very same crime he condemned Timaus for. He lived to a very old age (39), some say, ninety-six years. According to Polybius (40), he lived a sedentary life, which, in the opinion of that historian, must have disqualified him for writing history. Plutarch informs us (41), that he fell into the follies of Xenarchus in several parts of his works, in drawing good or bad omens from the most minute, and even ridiculous, circumstances. Cicero (42) puts him on a level with Herodotus, Thucydides, Philiftus, Theopompus, Ephorus, Xenophon, and Callisthenes. That he was superior, in point of authority, to Ephorus, when he treated of the affairs of Sicily, we think pretty evident from what we have just advanced, which we remember not to have feen taken notice of by any other author.

(29) Suid, ubi supra. (30) Idem ibid. & Voss. de hist. Grac. p. 82. Vide & Antigon. in Bauuas. hist. i. & Parthen. erot. xxix. (31) Dionss. Halicar. l. i. c. 6. Cic. epift. l. v. 22. ad Lucceium. (32) Diog. Laert. in Empedocl. l. viii. n. 60. Athen. in deipnosoph. l. xi. p. 471. (33) Suid. ubi sup. (34) Polyh. l. xii. (35) Idem ibid. & l. ii. p. 105. (36) Diod. Sic. l. v. sub init. Cic. de orat. l. ii. & in Bruto, sub sim. (37) Plut. in Nic. Longin. \pi eq i \forall \tau. c. 3. (38) Bayle, in dist. hist. & cris. (39) Lucian. in macrobiis, p. 642. tit. 2. (40) Polyh. l. xii. (41) Plut. ubi supra. (42) Cic. de orat. l. ii. Vide & Clem. Alexand. strom. l. i. Plut. in Dio. Phos. bibl. 244. Aul. Gell. l. xi. c. 1. Diod. Sic. l. xiii. & c.

dible fury. In his way he took Emporium, a town feated on the river Mazara (G), by ftorm; and having closely begirt Selinus with his army, which he divided into two parts, he formed the fiege of that city. In order to push this on with the greater vigour, he erected fix high towers, and brought as many battering-rams to the town. His slingers and darters likewise greatly annoyed the besieged, by forcing them from many fortified posts. The Selinuntines, little expecting such a visit from the Carthaginians, as having been the only people of Sicily who sided with them against Gelon, and having long been disused to sieges, were struck with great terror at the approach of fo formidable an army, and the resolution with which they carried on their attacks. However, as they had good reason to expect, that the Syracusians and their other confederates would fend them speedy succours, they defended themselves with great bravery. They all joined together as one man in their efforts to repel fo barbarous and ungrateful an enemy; even the men worn out with age, women and children, regardless of danger, appeared on the ramparts, ready to sacrifice their lives in the defence of their country *.

In order to inspire his troops with courage, Hannibal promised them the plunder And takes it. of the place, by which they were greatly animated. The walls being incessantly battered day and night by the rams, and other warlike engines, a breach was foon made, and the first who entered it were the Campanians, out of an ambition of distinguishing themselves above the rest; but they were repulsed with great loss, as were the Africans and Spaniards, whom Hannibal fent to support them. The fight lasted from noon to night, when Hannibal founded the retreat. In the mean time the Selinuntines sent expresses to Agrigentum, Gela, and Syracuse, acquainting them, that, without speedy affishance, it would be impossible for the garison of Selinus to defend itself against so numerous an army, provided with such a train of battering engines. The Agrigentines and Geleans held themselves in readiness to march; but however, thought it proper to wait for the Syracusian auxiliaries, that they might more successfully fall upon the enemy with their united forces. The Syracusians also, having certain advice, that Selinus was besieged, immediately struck up a peace with the Chalcideans, with whom they were then at war, and drew together what forces they could; but as they did not think them sufficient to relieve effectually the besieged, whom they apprehended to be in no imminent danger, they put off their march for some days, till they had got together a stronger force. In the mean time the Carthaginians pressed the siege with the utmost vigour. Hannibal, as soon as it was light, renewing the affault, possessed himself of the breach which had been made the day before, and of another, which his rams had opened near it; and, after removing the rubbish, with the flower of his troops charged the Selinuntines with such fury, that he obliged them to give ground; but could not put them in disorder, nor enter the city, they fighting like men in despair. Many fell on both sides; but the Carthaginians were constantly supplied with fresh men; whereas the Selinuntines had none to reinforce them, being all employed at once in defending the breaches. Thus the e affault was daily renewed for the space of nine days with great courage and resolution, and with incredible slaughter on both sides. At length the besieged being quite tired out, the Iberians, after a sharp dispute, lodged themselves on the ramparts, and from thence advanced into the body of the town; upon which the women from the tops of the houses filled all places with cries and lamentations. The Selinuntines, now giving up every thing for loft, barricaded all the streets and passages, being determined to defend themselves to the last drop of blood; which occasioned a long and bloody contest. The women also, notwithstanding their first panic, forely galled the Carthaginians with showers of tiles and stones thrown by them from the tops of the houses,

* EPHORUS & TIMEUS SICULUS apud DIOD. Sic. l. xiii.

(G) Rhodomanus, in his Latin version of Diodorus, calls this river Mazarus; but we chuse rather to follow Ptolemy, Pliny, and Diodorus himself, who give it a feminine termination. Some believe the word emporium here not to be a proper, but a common name; and we are inclined to come into this opinion. The name of this town, we believe, was Mazara; for Stephanus tells us, Mazara was a castle or fortress of the Selinuntines. Nothing was more common than to give rivers, and the fortreffes feated on them, the same names, and that even in Vol. VI. Nº 10.

Sicily itself. To wave all other instances at present. it may be sufficient to observe, that Gela, a city of great note in this island, had a river of the same name running close by its walls. On or near this spot there is a fine city, called Mazara, at this day; but no monuments of antiquity, according to Fazellus, are found near it. However, as it retains the old name of the river, and of Stephanus's Selinuntine castle, it seems to point out the true name of the town Hannibal took by storm on his march to Selinus.

which

which kept the fate of this city for some time in suspense; but the Carthaginians returning to the charge with inexpressible ardor, and continually pouring fresh men into the town, the poor Selinuntines were at length forced to give way, and having abandoned the narrow streets, were pursued by the conquerors into the market-place, where making a stand, they were all to a man cut in pieces.

An inflance of the Carthaginian barbarity.

Selinus being thus taken by storm, and the plunder of it given up to the soldiers, it is impossible to express the misery to which the poor inhabitants were reduced, and the crueities exercised upon them by the Carthaginians, who, it must be owned, on fuch melancholy occasions as these, generally shewed themselves to be most savage They raged in all parts of the town without restraint, rifled the houses, and then set fire to them, and either threw into the flames the women and children b they found in them, or dragging them into the streets, put them all, without distinction, to the sword. Neither did their inhumanity rest here; they carried it so far as to mangle in a barbarous manner even the dead bodies, some of them carrying about with them numbers of hands tied round their girdles, and others, out of oftentation; bearing the heads of the flain on the points of their fwords and spears. The women indeed, who fled with their children to the temples, escaped the common destruction; but this was owing to the avarice, not compassion, of the victors; for believing that these poor wretches would, if excluded all hopes of mercy, set fire to the temples, and by that means confume all the treasure and valuable effects they expected to find in those places, they did not judge it proper to drive them to a state of despe- c The ravages in the city continued most part of the night, insomuch that every place was full of blood, horror and confusion. The furviving matrons had the mortification to see their daughters forced to be subservient to the brutal lust of the barbarians, which, with a fense of the dismal servitude prepared for them in Africa, made them wish they had not survived their friends and relations. In fine, after sixteen thousand miserable wretches had been cruelly massacred, and two thousand six hundred escaped to Agrigentum, the city was razed, two hundred and fifty years after its foundation. The women and children, about five thousand in number, who outlived this fatal day, were carried away captives y.

A body of Selfnuntines escapes to Agrigentum.

The body of Selinuntines that retired to Agrigentum, made their escape by the d favour of the night, having sound an opportunity of abandoning the city, before the enemy had forced the narrow passes. Upon their arrival at Agrigentum, they were received with great humanity and tenderness; corn was distributed to them out of the public stores; and every private person, out of his own generous disposition, liberally supplied them with all kinds of necessaries for their subsistence.

The Carthagimans plunder the temple: at Selinus.

A few days after the city was taken, three thousand Syracustans arrived at Agrigentum, on their march to Selinus; but understanding that the city was taken, they sent embassadors to Hannibal, to treat of the redemption of the captives, and to beg of him, that he would at least spare the temples. Hannibal returned answer, that fince the Selinuntines had not been able to defend their own liberty, they deserved to e be treated like slaves; and that the gods, provoked at their wickedness, had forsaken both the city and the temples; whence it would be no sacrilege to strip them of their ornaments. This answer is a clear demonstration of the Punic genius at that time, and exactly corresponds with what Diodorus has related of the Carthaginians in this particular: "These barbarians, says that author, exceed all men in impiety; " for whereas other nations spare those who sly into temples, out of a principle of " religion, not daring to be guilty of any act of violence there, lest they should offend "the deity; the Carthaginians, on the contrary, moderate their cruelty to these ef persons, that they may have a better opportunity of pillaging the temples them-" felves." The Syracufians however, not acquiefcing in this answer, fent another f embassy, and at the head of it one Empediones, a Selinuntine, who had always been in the interest of the Carthaginians, and had even advised his countrymen to open their gates to Hannibal at his first appearing before the town. The Carthaginian general received him with great demonstrations of kindness, restored him to his estate, pardoned all the prisoners related to him, and even permitted the Selinuntines, who had fled to Agrigentum, to rebuild and repeople their city, and manure their lands, upon paying an annual tribute to the Carthaginians 2.

AFTER the reduction of Selinus, Hannibal marched with his army to attack Himera, Hannibal arwhich above all things he defired, in order to revenge the death of his grandfather tacks Himera. Hamilear, who had been sain there by Gelon, with above an hundred and fifty thoufand Carthaginians, and almost as many taken prisoners. Besides, as he had already punished the Selimentines for the insults they had offered his father Gifco in his banishment, he now resolved to take vengeance of the Himereans, for being the occasion of that banishment. On his march he was joined by twenty thousand Siculi and Sicani, whom he fent, with the main body of the army, to lay fiege to the city, while he, with a body of forty thousand men, encamped on a rising ground at a small distance from it. His troops being flushed with their late success, he pushed on the siege b with the utmost vigour, battering the wall with his engines in feveral places at once; but finding this not fully to answer his intention, he undermined it, and by supporting it with large pieces of timber, which were afterwards fet on fire, laid great part of it flat on the ground. Upon this, a warm dispute ensued, the Carthaginians making all possible efforts to enter the town; and the Himercans, having the fate of the Selinuntines always before their eyes, their parents, children, country, and every thing dear to them, to defend, and being moreover reinforced by four thousand Syracusian auxiliaries, with some troops from their other allies, under the command of Diocles, diffinguished themselves on this occasion in a most extraordinary manner; and repulfing the enemy with great bravery, immediately repaired the wall. In fine, c the Carthaginians having been constantly repulsed in their attacks for several days successively, were obliged for the present to desist from all further attempts to storm the town; which mortified them extremely, especially as they had not hitherto been able to gain an inch of ground 2.

THE Himereans, animated by this advantage, resolved not to be any longer cooped The Himereans up in the city, as the Selinuntines had been, but to endeavour, by one strenuous make a vigoreffort, intirely to dislodge the enemy. Having therefore posted detachments of their our fally upon garison at proper distances on the wall, to repel any assault that might be given, they nians. made a fally on the beliegers with their whole remaining force, confisting of ten thoufand men. The Carthaginians, little dreaming that the besieged were capable of d such an attempt, at first imagined, that the confederates of the Himereans had drawn together all their forces, to oblige them to raise the siege; which throwing them into a very great panic, the Himereans for some time easily bore down all that opposed them; and tho' the Carthaginians afterwards not only rallied, but collected their whole force before the town, to make head against them, yet their great number, an impediment to them at the present juncture, throwing them into disorder, they incommoded one another more than the enemy. The belieged, taking advantage of this, and being moreover inspired with fresh courage at the sight of their parents, children and friends, who, for this purpose, exposed themselves on the ramparts, charged them with such intrepidity, that they put their whole army to slight, pure suing them to the very hill where Hannibal was encamped. That general, seeing his army in confusion, hastened to their relief; upon which the battle was begun anew, and continued for some hours, victory inclining to neither side. At length But are rethe Himereans, being overpowered with numbers, gave ground; but three thousand pulsed. of them kept their posts, and covered the retreat of their companions, sustaining the shock of the whole Carthaginian army, till they all died upon the spot b.

THE Carthaginian army, though victorious, was yet rudely handled, the Himerean The Carthagitroops being much more active, and better disciplined (H), and, by reason of the nians sustain a cruel treatment they expected from their enemies, if conquered, inspired with a great loss in this action.

b Dion. Sic. ubi fupra. a Idem ibid.

(H) Though the native Carthaginians were well armed, and good troops, yet the Africans and Nu-midians were, for the most part, a disorderly rabble, very little acquainted with military discipline. These last troops always made up a considerable part of the Carthaginian armies, and frequently permitted themselves to be surprised by the enemy; which sometimes produced dismal effects. Plutarch, in his life of Timoleon, shews us how they were posted, and the order they observed, when the Carthagi-nian forces were in full motion to attack the enemy, and even when they engaged them. It is probable a great part of the army belieging Himera, consisted of these troops, whilst that under the command of Hanne, which covered the fiege, was composed of the national forces (20).

(20) Plut in Timol. Polyb. l. xiv. Liv. l. xxx. c. 3. & l. xxv. c. 13. & l. xxviii. c. 1. Hendr. l. ii. lect. 2. memb. 1. c. 7.

much

Diocles em-

his troops for the defence of Syracuse:

much greater degree of resolution. Ephorus says, the Carthaginians lost twenty thou- a fand men in the first action, before they were pursued to Hannibal's camp; though Timeus Siculus reduces this number to fix thousand. As there was a very sharp engagement afterwards betwixt the Himereans and Hannibal, many more must undoubtedly have perished, though the precise number of them is not given us by any historian. According to Diodorus Siculus, the Carthaginian army, that laid siege to the town, exclusive of Hannibal's camp, consisted of eighty thousand effective men c.

AFTER this action, five-and-twenty galleys, which had been fent by the Siculi fome time before to the affiftance of the Lacedæmonians, and were now returning home, appeared off of Himera; upon which a report was spread all over the city, and the enemy's camp, that the Syracusians, with all their forces and allies, were coming b to the relief of the city. This was so far from discouraging the Carthaginians, that it put Hannibal upon a new enterprize; for imagining that the Syracufians had fent all their strength to support their confederates, he doubted not but the city must be left in a manner defenceless; and therefore, immediately embarquing with the flower of his barques part of troops in the galleys which lay at Motya, prepared to fail for Syracuse, in order to surprise that city. In the mean time Diocles, commander in chief of the Syracusian troops in Himera, a man of great forelight and penetration, advised the captains of the Sicilian vessels to fail with all possible expedition to Syracuse, lest Hannibal should make an attempt upon it; and this he was the more strongly induced to, since, if in another action the besiegers should cut off the best of his men, he plainly perceived, c that their own city must of course fall a prey to the Carthaginians. He therefore thought it adviseable to leave Himera for a while, and with one half of his forces to return to Syracuse on the galleys, leaving the other half behind him, which he thought fufficient to hold out, till he, after putting his own city in a state of desence, should return. This the besieged took very ill; but not being able to prevail upon Diocles to alter his measures, the greatest part of their wives, children, and other effects, they took care to fend on board the galleys by night, in order to have them transported to Messana d.

As Diocles and his men embarqued in a great hurry, they were obliged to leave the bodies of their companions slain in the siege uninterred. However, they carried d off with them many of the Himereans, with their wives and children, who could not find room in the other vessels. Upon his departure, the Carthaginians redoubled their attacks, and battered the walls night and day without intermission. On the other hand, the besieged, believing the ships would return speedily, were indefatigable in defending the walls, repairing the breaches, and repulsing the enemy. Thus they held out against the repeated affaults and utmost efforts of above an hundred thousand men, till the very day the fleet appeared, when the Carthaginians, summoning all their courage and refolution, gave a general affault, and with their numtibich occasions bers bearing down all before them, drove the garison from the ramparts, and, in spite of their utmost efforts, entered the city sword in hand. The Iberians signalized e themselves greatly on this occasion, being the first that forced the besieged from the walls, and entered with them pell-mell into the town. There is no fort of cruelty which the barbarous Carthaginians and Iberians did not practife on their carrying the place; all they met, without regard to sex or age, were inhumanly butchered, till the general himself put a stop to the slaughter. The houses were plundered, the temples pillaged and burnt, after they had taken out of them those wretches who had fled thither for refuge; and the city itself levelled with the ground. Hannibal caused the women and children, that survived the first surv of the soldiers, to be preferved; neither durst any one offer the least injury to them: but the men, to the number of three thousand, he commanded to be carried to an eminence near the city, f where his grandfather Hamilear had been defeated and killed by Gelon's cavalry, and there first exposed them to the insults of his barbarians, and then caused them to be cruelly massacred.

the loss of Himera.

The Campanisifed by the

Thus ended this campaign, one of the most prosperous the Carthaginians had ever ans think themselves ill met with in Sicily; after which Hannibal, dismissing the Siculi and confederates, and disbanding the Campanians, embarqued with the rest of his forces, and set sail for The Siculi, upon their dismission, went home, as did likewise the Campamans; but the latter complained bitterly of the Carthaginians, because they looked

a upon themselves as slighted by that nation, tho' they had remarkably distinguished themselves in their service at the siege of Selinus, and indeed through the whole course of the campaign. Himera had itood, at the time it was razed by Hannibal, two hundred and forty years .

Hannibal, upon his quitting Sicily, left a small body of troops with his confede-Hannibal, as rates, that they might not be too much exposed to the resentment or ambition of his apparture their neighbours. After a short passage, he arrived safe at Carthage, loaden with the leaves some plunder he had carried off from Selinus and Himera. The whole city went out to troops to premeet him on his arrival, and received him with loud and joyful acclamations, as a rect his confe-general that had performed greater things in fo fhort a time than any ever before him f. derates there.

Animated by the late success in Sicily, the Carthaginians resolved now in earnest The Carthagito purfue the defign which they had ever entertained of reducing the whole island. nians make With this view they began to make new preparations, and raise another army, compreparations
mitting the whole management of the war to the form Harribal. But as he was for another mitting the whole management of the war to the same Hannibal. But as by reason campaign in of his great age he endeavoured to get himself excused from taking upon him the Sicily. command in this new expedition, they joined in commission with him Imilear, the fon of Hanno, one of the same family. These two generals being plentifully supplied with money, and impowered to raise what forces they thought necessary for

so great an undertaking, not only made great levies at home, but sent officers with large sums into Spain, Libya, Sardinia (I), and the Balearic islands, to hire numerous bodies of mercenaries. They received likewise large succours from the princes and states with whom they were in alliance, viz. from the Mauritanians, Numidians, and even the nations bordering on Cyrenaica. Besides all which, they took a body of Campanians out of Italy into their pay, which by experience they had found to be good troops, and such as they could intirely depend upon, especially when intermixed with those of other nations. When all their forces were mustered at Carthage, the army was found to confift of three hundred thousand effective men, as Ephorus informs us; but Timeus Siculus, with more probability, says, that they did not much exceed an hundred and twenty thousand; a force, however, sufficient, as it should

THE Carthaginians, in the interval betwirt the first beginning of their prepara- They people a 1 tions, and their embarquing for the Sicilian expedition, drew together out of Car-new city in thage, and other cities in Africa, all persons who were willing to transplant them that island, the called by the selves, and with them peopled a new city they had built near the hot-baths in Sicily, Greeks, from which was from thence called by the Greeks Therma.

BEFORE the grand fleet, which was composed of a thousand transports, besides Therma. a numerous squadron of galleys, with the forces on board, set sail for Sicily, Hannibal fent forty galleys to reconnoitre the coasts, and get intelligence of the enemy. These fell in with a Syracusian squadron of equal force off of Eryx, and immediately engaged them. The dispute was long and obstinate, but at last victory inclined to The Syracue the Syracusians. Of the Carthaginian galleys, fifteen were sunk, and the rest, by the sans defeat the favour of the night, made their escape. When the news of this unexpected defeat by sea. reached Cartbage, Hannibal failed immediately with fifty galleys, designing both to prevent any ill consequences from thence to the Carthaginians, and to secure the passage and landing of the army 8.

e Dion. Sic. ubi sup. f Idem ibid. apud eund. ibid.

feem, to over-run Sicily in one campaign.

Diop. Sic. ubi sup. atq; Ephorus & Timeus Siculus

(I) Livy tells us, that the Carthaginian armies were generally make up of a great variety of bar-barous nations, of different habits, different laws, different religions, and different languages, infomuch that they did not understand one another. As the Carehaginians applied themselves wholly to naval affairs, they employed most of their own hands on board their ships; and the most opulent citizens did not care to expose their persons in the wars, but contented themselves with enabling the state to hire foreigners in their room. They might likewise have some political views in this conduct; for by it they might imagine their state to be rendered

more secure, than if their armies consisted wholly of Carthaginian citizens, fince these could not be so intirely trusted, on account of the different powerful factions prevailing at Carehage; befides, fuch an army as we have mentioned could not eafily mutiny, or revolt, fince 'tis impossible so many different nations should act in concert, or form any dangerous scheme against their principals. However, Polybius condemns this practice, and not without reason, since it not a little contributed to the decline of the Carthaginian state, and once brought it to the very brink of destruction (2).

(2) Liv. l. xxviii. c. 12. Polyb. l. i. & l. vi. Dlod. Sic. l. xx. & l. v. Christ. Hendr. l. ii. sed. 2. mem. 1.

Vot, VI. Nº 10.

nd

(or

M

9 D

UPON

Hannibal lands his troops in Sicily, and

Upon Hannibal's arrival, the whole island was alarmed, and every city of consequence, having been before apprised of the great preparations of the Carthaginians, expected to be attacked first. Soon after, the whole fleet arriving fafe in Sicily, Agrigentum; the troops landed on the coast of Agrigentum, and marched strait to that city.

THE Syracusians, and their confederates, had fent embassadors to Carthage to complain of the late hostilities practifed upon them by Hannibal, and persuade the fenate to forbear fending any more troops into Sicily. But the Carthaginians returning a doubtful answer to this embassy, the Syracusians had put themselves in a posture of defence, and were prepared to give the enemy a warm reception. They had fent to the Greeks of Italy and the Lacedamonians to folicit succours, and dispatched expresses to all the Sicilian cities in their interest, desiring them to unite their b forces in defence of the common cause. But of all the people of Sixily, none were under fuch apprehensions as the Agrigentines; they seemed fully satisfied, that this great storm would first discharge itself upon them, and had therefore carefully provided all things necessary for the sustaining of a long siege, following therein the directions of Dexippus the Lacedæmonian, an officer of great courage and experience. The Carthaginians, upon their investing Agrigentum, divided their army into two bodies, one of which, consisting of forty thousand Africans and Iberians, encamped on certain eminences at some distance from the town; the other carried on the siege, and fortified their camp with a wall and an intrenchment, that they might be the better enabled to repulse the sallies of the besieged. When they first sat down before c the town, they invited the Agrigentines either to join them, or stand neuter, declaring they would be well satisfied with either point of conduct, and forbear all hostilities, if they only agreed to a treaty of amity and friendship. Both proposals being rejected, they attacked the town in form, expecting to meet with a vigorous relistance. And this indeed was not without reason; for the Agrigentines had obliged all who were capable of bearing arms, to affift in the defence of the place, and had moreover received a reinforcement of five hundred men from Gela, under the conduct of Dexippus the Lacedamonian, who was in high esteem at that time on account of his country, according to Timæus Siculus. Eight hundred Campanians also, who had formerly ferved under Imilear, were taken into the fervice of the Agrigentines, and & defended the hill Athenaum, which commanded the city, and was therefore a post of the utmost consequence. But notwithstanding these precautions, Imiliar and Hannibal, after having viewed the walls, and found a place, where they thought it would be no hard matter to make a breach, began to batter them with incredible fury, The machines chiefly made use of on this occasion were of surprising force; and two towers (K) were brought against the city, of a monstrous size. The first day out of these they made an assault; and after having cut off many of the besieged, sounded a retreat. However, the next night the Agrigentines made a fally, burnt the engines, destroyed the towers raised against them, and, after having made a great slaughter, retired in good order into the town. Hereupon Hannibal, intending to storm the e place in different parts at once, commanded all the tombs and stately monuments, standing round the city, to be demolished, and mounts to be raised with the rubbish as high as the walls. But whilft they were executing the general's orders, a religious panic seized the army, occasioned by Theron's monument being destroyed by a thunderbolt, which, by the advice of the foothfayers present, put a stop to the design. Soon after, the plague broke out in the army, and in a short time carried off a great number of the soldiers, and the general Hannibal himself. The Carthaginian soothsayers above-mentioned interpreted this disaster as a punishment inflicted by the gods in revenge of the injuries done to the dead. Nay, some of the foldiers upon guard affirmed, that they saw in the night-time the ghosts of the f

Which city he besieges, but meets with a WATM recep-

Theron's monument deftroyed by light-ning, which occasions a anic in the Carthaginian

(K) Soon after the Carthaginians had invested a town, they raifed a mount of equal height with the walls, if not superior to them; and thereon erected moveable towers, which overtopped the highest battlements and towers of some, either upon the walls or within the town. These moved upon wheels, and with them the besiegers gradually made their approaches towards the body of the place.

They were very large, and capable of containing confiderable numbers of men, and some of the finalier engines of battery, whereby the belieged were greatly annoyed. From these towers they made their affaults, and frequently flormed towns, or at least opened breaches in the walls, in order to facilitate that operation. Justice Lipsius gives us a minute and particular account of them (3).

(3) Just. Lips. polior. l. ii. c. 3, 4, 6c. Vid. eriam Died. Sic. l. xiii. Sil. Ital. l. i. 6 Chr. Hendr. l. il. fett, 1. memb. 1. c. 9.

deceased.

a deceased. Wherefore Imilcar, in whom the whole power was now vested, ordered supplications to be made, according to the practice of Cartbage, and the demolition of the tombs to be intirely discontinued. A boy was also sacrificed to Saturn, in compliance with a custom which had from remote antiquity prevailed amongst the Carthaginians: by his orders Neptune likewise was appealed, and several priests thrown into the sea, as the most pleasing victims to that deity. Imilcar having, as he imagined, by these cruelties atoned for the sacrileges of Hannibal, and pacified the gods, renewed the affaults with more vigour than ever, filled the river with rubbish close to the walls, by which means he brought up his engines nearer the place, and played with them upon the town in such a manner as reduced the besieged to b great streights ".

In the mean time the Syracufians taking into confideration the deplorable condition of Agrigentum, and fearing it would undergo the same fate that Himera and Selinus had done, began to think in earnest of marching to its relief. Having therefore drawn together the forces of their confederates from Italy and Messana, and being joined by the Camarineans, Geleans, and others out of the heart of the country, upon a review of their troops, they found them to amount to above thirty thousand foot, and five thousand horse. These judging sufficient for their purpose, they gave orders The Syracuto Daphneus, their general, to advance at the head of them immediately into the fians fend an territory of the Agrigentines, a fleet of thirty galleys, which failed close by the shore, him to raise e at the same time keeping pace with him. Imilear, upon intelligence of their approach, the siege; detached all the Iberians and Campanians, with forty thousand Carthaginians, injoining them to engage the enemy in the plains of the river Himera. Pursuant to his orders, the Syracustans were attacked a few hours after they had passed the river, as Which is as-they were advancing in good order towards Agrigentum. The dispute was sharp, tacked by the and the victory a long time doubtful, the enemy being far superior in number to but defeate the Syracusians. But at length the latter carried the day, and pursued the Cartha-them. ginians to the very walls of Agrigentum. Dapbneus fearing, lest Imilcar should take advantage of the confusion his troops were thrown into by their eagerness in the pursuit, and thereby wrest the victory out of his hands, as had formerly happened d to the Himereans on the like occasion, rallied them, and marched after the fugitives in good order to the spot they were before encamped upon, which he took immediate possession of. The Carthaginians lost fix thousand men in this action (L).

THE Carthaginians escaped a total defeat, either through the fear or corruption, as it should seem, of the Agrigentine commanders. For the besieged, seeing them fly to that part of their camp that lay next to the town in the utmost confusion, The Agrigenimmediately concluded, that they were routed; and therefore pressed their officers tine commanders guilty of a to fally out upon them without loss of time, that they might complete their ruin. falle flep, which They were however deaf to these solicitations, and would not permit a man to stir occas out of the town. To what motive such an unaccountable procedure was to be attri- loss of the place. e buted, is hard to fay; however, the fugitives were hereby faved, and arrived fafe in their other camp. This fatal step could never afterwards be retrieved, but was followed by the loss of the city k.

Upon Daphneus's arrival, a great part of the garrison, with Dexippus at the head of them, waited upon him, and a council of war was immediately held. Every one here shewed himself highly distarished, that so fair an opportunity had been loft of taking a full revenge of the enemy, and destroying so many myriads of them. Hereupon great disputes arose, insomuch that four of the Agrigentine com- A muting, manders, at the infligation of one Menes, a Camarinean, were found by the enraged wherein found multitude, and a fifth, called Argeus, only by reason of his youth, escaped. Dex-manders are f ippus himself was likewise highly reflected upon, and lost much of the reputation stoned, and a escapes.

h Diap. Sic. ubi sup.

1 Idem ibid.

. Idem ibid.

(L) We are told by Polymus, that Daphness defeated the Conthaginians by the following firstagem: therefore, to render the wictory complete, intreated them to exert themselves on the present occasion. Speak noise in the left wing, where the Isalian forces were posted; and bestearing thither, he found them contained by this good news, they immediately were posted; upon which immediately repairing should be supposed of Syracusians, he told beavery, they soon put them to slight (4).

he had before acquired, by concurring with the rest. After the council broke up, a Daphneus formed a design to attack Imilcar's camp; but finding it strongly fortified, he altered his refolution. However, he guarded all the avenues leading to it with his cavalry, intending by that means either to oblige the enemy to perish with famine, or come out of their lines, and venture an engagement. Accordingly, all the passages being blocked up, and the convoys intercepted, that numerous army was foon brought to fuch streights, that the Campanians, and other mercenaries, began to mutiny; and going in a body to Imilcar's tent, threatened to join the enemy, if Imilcar in great streights for want of provisions.

But supplies himself plentifully by intertransports, laden with corn, and all

Upon which city to the enemy.

٤.

they had not their usual allowance of bread. The general, with much ado, prevailed upon them to bear patiently their present want for a few days, assuring them they should be very soon plentifully supplied with all forts of provisions, and in b the mean time pawned to them the drinking vessels of the Carthaginian soldiers. He had been informed, that the Syracusians were then loading many ships with corn, to be fent to Agrigentum, and did not in the least doubt but he should intercept the convoy, the Syracusians not suspecting, that he would attempt any thing by sea. Accordingly, he dispatched messengers to Panormus and Motya, where his sleet lay, injoining the commanders to man the galleys with all possible expedition, and lie in wait, at an appointed place, for the ships that were to bring the provisions. His orders were put in execution; and forty galleys being speedily equipped, the Syracusian fleet, consisting of threescore transports, laden with corn, and all forts cepting a Syra- of provisions, was intercepted. Of their convoy, eight ships were sunk, and the c cutian fleet of rest driven on shore. This changed the face of affairs on both sides; for as such an unexpected relief gave the Carthaginians fresh courage, so it greatly disheartened the Agrigentines, who having already held out for the space of eight months, were forts of provi- in great want of all things, and without hopes of being relieved to quickly as their present necessity required. Besides, at the beginning of the siege, when bad success attended the Carthaginians, they had squandered away their corn and other provisions in a very profuse manner, by which means they were now reduced to the greater The Campanians in the service of the Agrigentines, observing the desperate distress. condition the city was in, upon receiving fifteen talents from Imilcar, went all over complying, they left the Agrigentines to shift for themselves (M).

the Agrigentines refolve to leave their necessaries, a council of war was summoned, when it was judged absolutely imposfible to hold out any longer, there not being provisions enough in the public stores to support the foldiery and people two days. It was therefore resolved, that the e city should be abandoned, and the inhabitants conveyed to some place of safety; and the following night was fixed upon for their departure. The people, being apprifed of this resolution, were thereby thrown into the utmost consternation. Lamentable outcries were heard in every house; and the grief and dread they were all feized with in feeing themselves obliged to abandon their native country, their goods and estates, or else expose themselves to the fury of a merciless enemy, were inexpressible. However, though their riches were immense, yet they esteemed life still more valuable a and therefore, as they expected no mercy from such cruel barbarians, the greatest part of them gave way to unavoidable necessity. We shall not in a body to the Carthaginians. Dexippus the Lacedamonian also, according to Dio- d dorus, was faid to have been bribed with the same sum; for he on a sudden advised the Italian commanders to withdraw their troops out of the town, infinuating, that they were likely to be starved there, without the least prospect of rendering any fervice to those who had hired them: whereas, by retiring in time, they might carry on the war to greater advantage in some other part: with which advice

THE mercenaries thus falling off, and the inhabitants desponding for want of Dion. Sic. ubi fup.

(M) Polyanus tells us, that Imilcar (whom he calls Himileo) gave private orders to his men to fly be-fore the belieged whenever they made a faily, in order to draw them into an ambuscade. There happened to be a wood just before the town, in which he posted a detachment of his troops, with orders to fet this on fire as foon as the enemy were got at a confiderable distance from the town. This firstagem had the defined effect; for the Agrigentines pursued the Carthaginlans with great ardour for some time; but at last looking back towards the city, they perceived the wood all in a blaze; which they imagined was a fire issuing out of the city itself. Upon this they retired with great precipions towards the round; but folling into the approximation towards the round; but folling into the approximation. tation towards the rown; but falling into the ambuscade, and being hotly pursued by the party that drew them out, they were all either killed or taken prifoners (3).

(3) Polyan. firatagem. l. v. v. v. v. v. v. v. Vid. & Frentin. firat. l. iii. c. 10. ex. 5.

a here expatiate upon the scene of horror now before us, Diodorus Siculus having done this in a most affecting manner, but only observe, that the place appointed for these miserable wretches to retire to was Gela, where, when they arrived, they were received with great kindness and humanity, and plentifully supplied with all necessaries at the expence of the public. What happened to their afterwards may be feen in a former part of this history m.

THE garrison was no sooner withdrawn, and the Syracusian army retired, but Imilear, marching out of his trenches, entered the city, not without some fear and Imilear enters jealousy, and put all those he found in it to the sword, not sparing even such as the city, where had fled to the temples. Among these was Gellias (M), a citizen famous for his great cruelties, b wealth and integrity, who feeing that the Carthaginians, without respecting the gods, plundered their temples, and murdered those who had taken sanctuary in them, set fire to the temple of Minerva, and confumed in the flames both himself and the immense riches of that stately edifice. Gellias, according to Diodorus, was induced to this action in order to prevent three evils: first, the impiety of the enemy to the gods; secondly, the sacrilegious carrying off of the vast treasure lodged there; and, thirdly, the abuse of his own body o.

Imilcar having pillaged every part of the city, both facred and profane, found and pillages himself master of an immense treasure. Nothing less could be expected from the every part of it. spoils of a city, which was one of the most opulent in Sicily, containing two hundred c thousand inhabitants, and had never before been plundered, or even besieged. An infinite number of pictures, vales, and statues, done by the greatest masters of those times, fell into the enemy's hands, the Agrigentines having an exquisite taste for the polite arts. To give our readers some idea of Agrigentum, it will be sufficient to observe, that the very sepulchral monuments shewed the luxury and magnificence of this city, they being adorned with statues of birds and horses, famous for their elegance. Empedocles, the philosopher, born in Agrigentum, has a memorable saying Empedocles's concerning his fellow-citizens; That the Agrigentines squandered away their money so saying of the excessively every day, as if they expected it could never be exhausted; and built with such Agrigentines. folidity and magnificence, as if they thought they should live for ever. The most valud able part of the plunder Imilear fent to Carthage; every thing else he caused to be fold under the spear. Among other curiosities, the samous bull of Phalaris was fent to Carthage of

THE people of Syracuse, being prodigiously alarmed at the reduction of Agrigentum, had a decree passed for the raising a numerous body of troops to oppose the progress of the Carthaginians, who with a mighty army hovered over the frontiers. Imilcar having gained the city, after eight months siege, a little before the winter solstice, did not presently raze it, but there took up his winter-quarters, to give his army the necessary refreshment. The Sicilians in general, as well as the inhabitants of Syra- Many of the cuse, were struck with terror at the Carthaginian conquests, and many of them fled Sicilians, being e to Syracuse for protection, whilst others transported themselves, with all their effects, server at the to the continent of Italy. Those who took fanctuary in Syracuse, were treated with Carthaginian extraordinary kindness, and the chief men among them made free of the city. conquests, fly to m Idem ibid. Univ. hift. vol. iii. . Dion. Sic. ubi fup. & Cic. l. iv. in Ver. c. 33.

Syracule for

* Idem ibid. See also univ. hist. vol. iii. p. 42. not. (X). protedion.

(M) The munificence of Gellias may be learned not only from Diodorus Siculus, but Valerius Maximus and Athenaus (1). He entertained the people with spectacles and feasts, and, during a famine, prevented the citizens of Agrigentum from perishing with hunger. He gave portions to poor maidens, and rescued the unfortunate from want and despair. He had built houses in the city and country, purposely for the accommodation of strangers, whom he usually dismissed with handsome presents. In short, Gellias's riches, immense as they were, were furpassed by his greatness of soul, his treasures being, as it were, to use Valerius Maximus's phrase, the patrimony of the public. No wonder then that the inhabitants of Agrigentum, and all the neigh-bouring provinces, should so ardently pray for his health and prosperity. No greater loss could have happened to that part of Sicily than the fatal end of so excellent a person, but the death and destruction of all those poor wretches, who should have regretted him. Atheneus, in all the present MSS. calls him Tellias; but Nicolans Sturio has discovered this to be a fault of the transcribers, though it must have been a very antient one, fince Eustathius oftener than once calls him likewise Tellias. What Athenews has concerning him is taken almost word for word out of the eleventh book of Timaus's history, and possibly Diodorns's may have been deduced from the same source. The great resemblance betwixt the capital tau (T) and gamma (I) might possibly occasion the mistake above-mentioned; for that it is a mistake, the printed copies and MSS. of Diodorus Siculus and Valerius Maximus sufficiently evince.

(1) Valer. Max. l. iv. c. ult. Athen. deipnosoph. l. i. Vld. & If. Casaub, animadvers. in Athen. l.i. p. 12. Vol. VI. Nº 10.

Among

Among them were many Agrigentines, who filled the city with their complaints a against the Syracusian commanders, as if they had betrayed Agrigentum into the enemy's hands. This raised such disturbances in Syracuse as at last gave Dionysius an opportunity of seizing upon the sovereign power. Imilcar, after laying it intirely in ruins, towards the beginning of the spring, left Agrigentum P.

The Syracufians fend D'onyfius to affift the people of

THE Geleans, receiving intelligence, that the Carthaginians intended to open the campaign with the siege of their city, and in the mean time falling out among themselves, implored the protection of Syracuse; upon which Dionysius immediately marched to their affiftance with two thousand foot, and four hundred horse. The Geleans were so well fatisfied with his conduct, that they treated him with the highest marks of distinction, and even sent embassadors to Syracuse to return their thanks b for the important fervice that city had done them in fending him thither. Soon after, he was appointed generalissimo of the Syracusian forces, and those of their allies, against the Carthaginians. This enabled him to give many proofs of his great capacity both in civil and military affairs, as has been already shewn, and will further appear in the fequel of this history.

Imilcar marches with his army against Ge'a,

THE Carthaginian forces under the command of Imilcar, having, on the return of the spring, razed the city of Agrigentum, made an incursion into the territories of Gela and Camarina; and after having ravaged them in a dreadful manner, carried off fuch an immense quantity of plunder from thence as filled their camp. Imilear then marching with his whole army against Gela, took post on the banks of the river c Gela; and ordering his men to cut down all the trees about the town, fortified his camp with a ditch and a wall (N), not doubting but Dionysius would come to the relief of the belieged with a powerful army. The Geleans, in the beginning of the fiege, were determined to fend away their wives and children to Syracuse, as a place of greater fafety; but they all, running to the altars in the forum, could not be prevailed upon to retire, but protested that they would undergo the same sate as their husbands and parents. This resolution encouraged the Geleans to exert themfelves in the defence of persons so dear to them, and to whom they were so dear. They made feveral fallies with good fuccess, cutting great numbers of the enemy in pieces, and bringing many of them prisoners into the town. No sooner was a breach d opened in the wall by the Carthaginian rams (O), but the citizens repaired it,

P Drop. Sic. ubi fup.

(N) It will be proper in this note to mention fome particulars relating to the Carchaginian camps, which we have hitherto not had an opportunity of doing. When the Carthaginians were apprehentive, that the enemy would attempt to raife the fiege of any place they had formed, they fortified their camp with a ditch and a wall, as we learn here from Diodorss, Their camps feem to have been formed in a regular manner, resembling a town, and had gates to them. The Numidian camp was always separated from the Carthaginian; the reasons of which seem to have been, that the Carthaginians were generally foot, but the Numidians horse, and that the latter could not permit themselves to be confined to the rules of military discipline so easily as the former. The general's tent was, for the most part, fixed on an eminence in the middle of the camp, being much more magnificent and superb than the others. Hither the officers repaired to receive their respective orders; and a strong guard, Polybins intimates a thousand horse and as many foot, were generally posted before it. Near this stood the facred tabernacle, and the altar, where the general, and officers of distinction, performed their devotions. The Carthaginian tents seem to have been raised in a regular manner of wood, fascines, &c, resembling so many cottages; but the Numidian were the reverse, consisting only of reeds, fraw, stubble, and other such-like flight materials (2). (O) The ram was a battering engine used in:

fieges by the antients. Pliny tells us it was found out by Epeus, a Greek, at the fiege of Troy; but this is not very probable, because we find no mention made of it in Homer, who, if such a wonderful machine had been then known, could not poffibly have omitted taking notice of it. "Tis therefore much more likely, that the Carthaginians invented it, as Viernoins and Tertullian believe, with whom Lipius agrees. The ram was a large beam, equal to the mast of a ship, with a head of solid iron, resembling that of a sam, from whence it derived it's name. This was fastened in the middle to another beam, supported by a large piece of timber on each fide, by ropes, in fuch a manner as to be pendulous like a balance. This being drawn backwards by a great number of hands as far as possible, was then pushed forwards with as great an imperusas they could give it, so that the iron head beating against the walls of a city with inconceivable force, eatily shook them; neither was there any wall on tower but what this, by repeated blows, was capable of battering down. As these blows in some respects resembled the buttings of a ram, this was a further reaton for giving the machine the name of that ani-mal. Appear relates, that the Romans battered the walls of Carrhage with two rams of an immense fize, one of which was played by a body of fix thousand foot, and the other by a vast number of rowers, which may ferve to give us some idea of this terrible engine. 'Tis mentioned by the prophet a being indefatigable night and day on the ramparts, where their wives and children chearfully shared with them the labour and danger. The young men were consinually in arms, and engaged with the enemy, and the rest employed in working and other necessary services. In fine, they defended themselves with such courage and And meets resolution, that, though their city was but very indifferently fortified, they held out with a vigora long time against a most formidable army, without receiving the least assistance our resistance.

(2) Liv. l. xxvi. c. 13. & l. xxviii. c. 1. Diod. Sic. l. xiii. Just. Lips. l. v. dial. 2. milit. Rom. Polyh. l. i. c. 45. & l. iii. c. 71. Diod. Sic. l. xx. Liv. l. xxx. c. 3. Polyh. l. vi. Plutarch. in Scip. Lips. milit. Rom. l. v. dial. 5. & Christ. Hendr. Careb. l. ii. sect. 2. memb. 1. 6. 7.

In the mean time Dionysius, by the junction of his mercenaries, and succours from Dionysius ad-Magna Gracia with the Syracusians, almost every one of whom capable of bearing vances to the arms he obliged to lift under his standard, formed an army of fifty thousand foot, according to fome, though Timeus Siculus makes them only thirty thousand, and b a thousand horse; with which, and fifty sail of ships, he advanced to the relief of Gela. Upon his arrival before the city, he encamped near the sea, that his fleet and army might act in concert. With his light-armed troops he proposed to prevent the enemy from foraging, whilst his horse and shipping should intercept all provisions coming to their camp from any part of the Carthaginian dominions; which he doubted not would greatly distress them. However, for twenty days he effected nothing; which much chagrining him, he refolved to attack the enemy's camp, and, in order to this, made the following disposition of his forces: The Sicilian And attacks foot had orders to move towards the left, and attack the enemy's trenches; the the enemy's troops of the confederates were to file off to the right, and marching to the shore, camp; c attempt the camp in the weakest place; the mercenaries, under his conduct, were to advance through the town, to the spot where the Carthaginian engines were placed, in order to destroy them; the horse he commanded to pass the Gela, upon a fignal given by the foot, to join them, if superior to the enemy, or, if repulsed, to support them; and lastly, the sea-officers received orders to approach as near the enemy's camp as possible with the ships, when the Italian troops came up. As

9 Idem ibid.

Imilcar had fent a strong detachment towards the shore, to oppose the enemy's land-

Ezekiel in two passinges, and Nebuchadnezzar made use of it at the siege of Jurusalem. Whether the Carthaginians, or their ancestors the Tyrians, (for both sometimes went by the same name) first discovered it, cannot be certainly determined, nor at what time the discovery was made; but we take Exekiel to be the earliest author in whom any men-tion of it is to be seen. Our learned readers will find a particular and full description of the various kinds of this machine in Vitruvius and Lipfius, whom at their leifure they may confult (2).

Now we are upon this subject, we shall here - once for all give a short account of the catapulta and the balifia, two other engines frequently taken notice of by the ancient historians. The catapulta was a machine out of which the Carthaginians, and other nations, fent vollies of darts and large arrows, made on purpose, upon the enemy, particularly upon those parties of garrisons posted on the ramparts, to prevent the enemy entering the breaches made by the rams. Diodorus intimates, that this engine was but of late invention at the siege of Motya. Some authors confound this with the balifia, which was an engine out of which stones of a vast weight were discharged; for Diodorus writes, that the Car-thaginians filled Lilybaum with catapules, out of which they threw stones; and Appian relates the same of the Roman casapules. But Lipsius (and he has reason on his fide) makes them different machines, though he allows, that the satapulta discharged both stones and arrows. That author says, there were two forts of catapules, the majores catapulta, and the minores; the first fent forth showers of darts and arrows of three cubits long, the other those of half that length. At the taking of new Carthage in Spain, an hundred and twenty large entapults were found there, and two hundred and eighty-one of the smaller size. The Carthaginians always abounded with these engines: when Pyrrbus attacked Lilybaum, there was such an abundance of them at that place, that the walls would fearce contain them; and, a little before the destruction of their city, they delivered up to the Romans two thousand of them, according to Appian, or, as Strabo will have it, three thousand. The balista, as just hinted, was an engine out of which the autients threw stones of a prodigious magnitude: this was also used at sieges, and in many respects answered to the battering cannon of the moderns, only the balista, if we may depend upon the relations of the antients, feems to have been a machine of much greater force. According to Lipsius, the balista likewise was either major or minor; the major threw stones of three hundred and fixty pound weight, and the minor those of an hundred. Hegesippus relates feveral furprifing effects of this engine, which we have not time to take notice of. Livy tells us, that the Romans found at Carthage twenty-two of the larger baliffa, and of the smaller sitty-two. Ammianus Marcellinus, as explained and illustrated by Lipsius, gives an accurate account of the antiquity, use, form, and, in short, of every thing relating to these terrible engines, to which authors, for their further satisfaction, we must beg leave to refer our curious readers (3).

(2) Tertul, de Pal, Plin, Joseph. Vitruv. & Veget. apud Lipsium in poliorc. l. iii. dial. t. & alib. Appian. in Libyc. Vitruv. l. x. c. 19. Ezek. iv. t, 2. & xxī. 22. Plin l. vii. c. 56. Christ. Hendr. ubi sup. p. 468—475.
(3) Just. Lips. ubi sup. dial. 2. & 3. Vid. etiam Frid. Tsubmannum in Plane. capt. act. iv. scen. ii. v. 16. Diod. Sic. in excerpt. l. xxii. c. 14. Appian. in Libyc. p. 46. Liv. l. xxvi. c. 47. Ammian. Marcellin. l. xxiii. Hegesip. l. iii. c. 12. Vid. & Joseph. Laurentium de torment. c. 7, &c.

ing, and defend that part of the camp which lay most exposed, the Italian auxiliaries met with a great refistance. However, they behaved with such bravery, that they routed this body of troops, cut a great number of them in pieces, and advanced to the Carthaginian camp in good order, which they attacked with incredible fury. Had they been duly supported, they must have carried it, and thereby totally ruined the enemy. But Dionysius, at the head of the mercenaries, not finding himfelf able to advance with sufficient expedition through the streets of the city to their relief, the Siculi being too remote to afford them timely succour, and the garrison not daring to make an effectual fally by way of diversion, lest they should leave the walls too naked; the Carthaginians resuming their courage, and being relieved But is repulsed by a powerful supply of fresh troops, soon broke them, killed a thousand on the b with great loss.

spot, and forced the rest into a narrow pass within the lines. Here they must all have been inevitably cut off, had not a shower of darts, and other missive weapons from the fleet, favoured their retreat. The Sicilian foot, in the mean time. charged a large body of Africans with such resolution, that they put them to slight, and pursued them to their very trenches with great slaughter; but these Africans being foon reinforced by the Campanians, Iberians, and Carthaginians, who had routed the Italians, and thereby were at liberty to march this way, returned to the charge with greater fury than ever, and overpowering the Siculi, drove them back to the town, with the loss of fix hundred men. The horse finding the foot not able to withstand the efforts of the enemy, and seeing these advance on all sides in c order to furround them, retired likewise to the city with precipitation. Dionysius, with his mercenaries, perceiving the greatest part of his army thus rudely handled, thought proper also to retreat, and take shelter within the walls. After this unsuccessful attempt, he summoned a council of war, consisting of his particular friends, the result of whose deliberations was, that, since the enemy was so much superior to them in strength, it would be highly imprudent to put all to the issue of a battle; Which obliges and therefore, that the inhabitants should be persuaded to abandon their country, as the inhabitants the only means to fave their lives. In consequence of this, a trumpet was sent to Imilcar, to desire a cessation of arms till the next day, in order, as was pretended, to bury the dead, but in reality to give the people of Gela an opportunity of making d their escape. Towards the beginning of the night, the bulk of the citizens lest the place, and he himself, with the army, followed them about midnight. To amuse the enemy, he left two thousand men of his light-armed troops behind him, commanding them to make fires all night, and fet up loud shouts, as though the army remained still in the town. At day-break, these took the same rout as their companions, and pursued their march with great celerity. By these stratagems, Dionyfius preserved the inhabitants of Gela from all insults, and secured the retreat of his

to abandon the place.

Dionysius fecures their retreat, and that of his army, by a ftratagem.

Imilear plun- cified all he met with in it. He likewise thoroughly plundered it, in the same manner ders Gela, and as Agrigentum, and then moved with his forces towards Camarina. Dionysius had towards Camarina, which prising them of Imilear's speedy approach. Their city underwent the same sate undergoes the same fate.

and Syracusian army, immediately entered it, and either put to the sword or cru- e before drawn off the Camarineans with their wives and children to Syracuse, by apwith that of Gela. The manner in which it was abandoned, Diodorus Siculus describes in a most moving manner. But this, as well as what happened to Dionysius hereupon, may be seen at large in a former part of this history. Imilear, in the mean time, finding his army extremely weakened, partly by the casualties of war, and partly by a plague broken out in it, and not thinking himself in a condition to continue the war, fent a herald to Syracuse to offer terms of peace f to the conquered. His unexpected arrival was very acceptable to Dionysius, and a A peace con- treaty of peace was immediately concluded with the Carthaginians. The articles of cluded betwixt it were; that the Carthaginians, besides their antient acquisitions in Sicily, should the Carthagi- fill possess the countries of the Sicani, the Selinuntines, the Himereans, and Agrigentines; that the people of Gela and Camarina should be permitted to reside in their respective cities, which yet should be dismantled, upon their paying an annual tribute to the Carthaginians; that the Leontini, Messanians, and all the other Sicilians, should live according to their own laws, and preserve their own liberty and inde-

Imilear finding the city deserted by the greatest part of its citizens, the garrison,

a pendency, except the Syracusians, who should continue in subjection to Dionysius. These articles being ratified by both parties, Imilcar returned to Carthage, having lost above half of his army. The plague afterwards made dreadful havock in Africa, carrying off vast numbers both of the Carthaginians and their allies t.

BEFORE the Carthaginian army retired from Sicily, Imilcar separated the Campanians from the other troops, and left them to defend his conquests in that island. It happened foon after, that Dionysius was reduced to such extremities by his subjects Dionysius in the Syracusians, that he was advised by his most intimate friends either to kill himself, imminent danor by one desperate effort force his way through the enemy's camp, and escape to those ger of loging the places which were subject to the Carthaginians. But Philistus (E) the historian, who, as Syracutes b for a considerable time, had supported Dionysius, opposed this advice, telling him, that he ought to resume his courage, and either maintain himself on the throne, or The tyrant, falling in with the fentiments of Philistus, resolved to part with his life, rather than the power he had acquired. In consequence of this resolution, he dispatched an express privately to the Campanians, and by large offers prevailed upon them to march to his relief. By their assistance he soon extricated But delivered himself out of the difficulties in which he was before involved, and afterwards became from thence by a scourge both to his own subjects and the Carthaginians ".

the Campanians.

Idem ibid. " Diop. Sic. l. xiv. c. 3.

(E) This Philiflus was, according to Suidas (1), the ion of Archonidas, or, as Paujanias calls him, Archomenidas, and scholar to the elegiac poet Euenus. He was particularly intimate with Dionysius, and above any other person instrumental in establishing that tyrant's power at Syracufe; tor which reason he obtained the government of the citadel there. It is suggested by some, that he enjoyed too great a degree of familiarity with Dionysius's mother, tho with his privity. However this may be, upon his marrying the daughter of Leptines, brother to Disnysius, without imparting his design to that prince, he was banished by him, and retired to Adria. He was not permitted to return as long as the tyrant lived; but in the time of Dionysius the younger, those who opposed Dion had him recalled; for they were asraid, lest Plato, by his eloquence and philosophy, should change the tyrant's mind, which they believed (2) fo learned a man as Philistus would be able to prevent, especially as he was perfectly well acquainted with the manner of adapting himself to the tyrant's disposition. He answered their expectations; for, as foon as he was in favour, he opposed Place, and persuaded Dienysius to expel Dion. after, Dion made war upon Dionysius, and besieged him in the castle of Syracuse. Philistus hastened to his assistance from Inpygia, with a strong squadron of (3) galleys, but had the missfortune to be deseated. Ephorus fays, he fell by his own hands, and is followed herein by Diodorus Siculus. But Timonides, who lived with Dion from the beginning of these commotions, informs us, that he was taken pri-foner, and put to death; with whom Timans Sicu-lus in the main agrees. Diodorus Siculus says, ho was dened burial. He may justly be esteemed to have been a man of merit, if we consider his wit, his learning, his writings, and even his bravery, which will, in some measure, appear from the account of him in the history of Syracuse. Suidas (4) ascribes to him a treatise concerning oratory; Ægypeiaca, or the history of Egypt, in twelve books; res Sicula, or the Sicilian history, in eleven books; some orations, and one amongst the rest against Tricaranus, concerning the city of Naucrasis; the hi-flory of Dionysius the tyrant; three books about the

theology of the Egyptians; and a treatife concerning Liéya and Syria. Cicero (5) highly celebrates his learning and diligence. His Sicilian history was the work in greatest esteem, of which, according to Diodorus Siculus (6), there were two parts. first consisted of seven books, including the transactions of eight hundred years, and concluding with the third year of the ninety-third olympiad, when the Carthaginians took Agrigentum. The other begins where the first left off, that is, at the time when Dionysius the elder began his reign over the Syracusians, which was the year after the taking of Agrigentum. According to Cicero (7), he took great pleafure in imitating Thueydides; and, if Quintilian (8) may be credited, exceeded him in peripicuity. Dionysius Halicarnas-seus (9) made him too much inferior to Thucydides. However, all are agreed, that he much refembled him in the concidencis of his style. He affected this so much, that, if Them (10) may be believed, he avoided digressions to an excess. Timeus abused him; but Ephorus extelled him up to the skies; for which they are both censured by Plutarch (11) His works, as well as those of Epherus and Timans Siculus, are all intirely loft. Had Philistus's Sicilian history, and his treatise concerning Libys, been extant, we should undoubtedly have mer with many curious particulars relating to the building of Carthage, the first formation, growth, and decay of the Carthaginian state; in short, of all the principal transactions in which it was concerned, from its earliest ages to his time. This is not only probable from the titles of those pieces, but likewise from a hint given us by (12) Eusebius and Appian. Not-withstanding he wrote a history during his banishment, he did not flew any refentment against Dionyfius in it, but, on the contrary, flattered him, and concealed his vices. This conduct Paulanias (13) endeavours to excuse, or at least to polliate, by faying, that the motive to it was a defire to be recalled to Syracuse. Some believe Philistus to have been born at Naucratis, others at Syracuje, and lastly, others believe there were two historians of that name, one of whom was born at Naucrati:, and the other at Syracuse. It is not very material which of these is in the right.

(1) Suid in Dirisoc, & Pausan in Eliac. l. w. Diod. Sic. l. xiv. & xvi. & Plut. in Dion. ubi sup. (3) Idem ibid & Diod. Sic. l. xvi. (4) Suid. ubi sup. (5) Cic. de (6) Diod. Sic. l. xiii. (7) Cic. de orat. l. ii. (8) Quintil. l. x. c. 1. (5) Dionys. H. Pomp. (10) Theon in programasm. c. 4. (11) Plut. ubi sup. (12) Euseb. it chron. A. Vide of animal sups. (12) Euseb. it chron. d. (13) Plut. ubi sup. (14) Euseb. it chron. d. (15) Plut. ubi sup. (15) Euseb. it chron. d. (16) Plut. ubi sup. (17) Euseb. it chron. d. (18) Plut. ubi sup. (19) Euseb. it chron. d. (19) Plut. ubi sup. (19) Euseb. it chron. d. (19) Plut. ubi sup. (19) Euseb. it chron. d. (19) Plut. ubi sup. (19) Euseb. it chron. d. (19) Plut. ubi sup. (19) Euseb. it chron. d. (19) Plut. ubi sup. (19) Euseb. it chron. d. (19) Plut. ubi sup. (19) Euseb. it chron. d. (19) Plut. ubi sup. (19) Plut. ubi (5) Cic. de divinas, l. i. (5) Dionys. Halicarn. ep. ad Pomp. (10) Theon in progymnasm. c. 4. (11) Plnt. ubi J Vide & animadvers. Scaliger. in loc. Appian. in Libyc. sub init. & Vost. de hist. Grac. l. i. c. 6. Vol. VI. No 10. (11) Eufeb. in chron. ad num. DCCCIV. (13) Pau an. in Attic. p. 25. Vide

HAVING

mians;

HAVING disarmed the inhabitants of Syracuse, and by that step fixed his sovereignty a farations for a there, he began to make the necessary preparations for renewing the war with the new war with Carthaginians; for he had struck up the late peace with Imilear so suddenly, with no other view, than to amuse him till he had established his authority, and found himself in a condition to attack the Carthaginian conquests in Sicily with a powerful army. The motives that seem immediately to have prompted him to this war, were two: First, to prevent the future desertion of his subjects, many of whom retired every day with all their effects to the Carthaginian garrifons, as well as to recover those he had lost, since he imagined, that, upon the breaking out of a rupture, the cruel treatment of the Carthaginians would drive them from thence. And secondly, the great prospect of success he had at that particular juncture, by reason of the deplorable ravages b the plague then made in the Cartbaginian territories. As he knew the Cartbaginians to be the most potent nation in the west, and that, if an opportunity offered, they would most certainly besiege Syracuse, he thought proper, by way of precaution, to fortify the hill Epipola, which commanded the town. This he did at a vall expence, with the affiltance of fixty thousand freemen, and fix thousand yoke of oxen. Diodorus tells us, that on this occasion the tyrant did not only superintend every part of the work, but frequently worked himself, enduring as much hardship and satigue as the poorest labourer; by which means the workmen were inspired with such a spirit of emulation and alacrity, that they laboured all day, and part of the night, and, which is almost incredible, in twenty days finished a wall thirty furlongs in length, c and of a proportionable height, which being flanked with high towers, placed at proper distances, and built of hewn stone, rendered the place almost impregnable w.

And fortifies the hill Epipolz.

HAVING thus put his own city in a state of defence, he made preparations suitable to the undertaking he was going upon, being very sensible with how formidable a power he was foon to cope. His first care was to bring to Syracuse from all parts of Sicily, Greece, and Italy, great numbers of workmen, whom he employed in forging all forts of arms. As he found, that mercenaries came flocking in to him from all parts, his intention was to have them all armed after the manner of their respective countries, imagining that by this means they would be more capable of distinguishing themselves, and of striking a terror into the enemy. Not only the porches of the d temples, but the schools, walks, piazza's about the forum, and every public place, Artificers floik nay, even private houses, were filled with workmen. The great wages which Dioto him out of nyfius paid them, induced the best artificers every-where to offer him their service. and foon enable He himself directed them in every thing relating to the form of the weapons they him to build a were to forge, and appointed the chief of the citizens to superintend them, with vastnumber of orders to promise great rewards to the diligent for their suture encouragement. The Jinps, and to art of making engines to batter walls was, according to Diodorus, now first brought ous quantity of to Syracuse; but the artificer's name, to whom Dionysius was obliged for this, is nowhere told us. As he was ambitious of being superior to the Carthaginians by sea, he caused a vast quantity of timber for building his galleys to be brought from Italy, where it was drawn on carriages to the sea-side, and then shipped for Syracuse. Mount e Æina also supplied him with many fir and pitch trees, with which it then abounded. Having provided the necessary materials, he employed such a prodigious number of hands, that a fleet of two hundred sail was soon ready to put to sea; to which he added an hundred and ten old galleys, that were refitted. He likewise caused an hundred and fixty distinct receptacles to be made round the harbour, for sheltering his fleet from the weather, which would contain two ships a-piece; and after he had repaired an hundred and fifty old useless vessels, covered them with planks. The Syracusians themselves manned half of the long ships, and the foreigners, who had entered into Dionysius's service, the rest. In order to have his troops completely armed as foon as possible, Dionysius animated the artificers by his presence, by the f applauses he gave them, and by his bounty, in which all the diligent part of them shared. But his popular and winning behaviour excited more strongly, than any other circumstance, the industry and ardour of these people; for those who distinguished themselves, either by their ingenuity or application, were not only sure of receiving some particular marks of his favour, but even sometimes had the honour to dine or fup with him. It is no wonder therefore, that in a shorter time than can easily be conceived, besides an immense quantity of other arms, he had got ready an hundred a and forty thousand bucklers, the same number of swords and helmets, and sourteen thousand cuirasses, all of excellent workmanship. He had also prepared for service a large train of battering engines of all kinds, and an infinity of darts. As for landforces, besides his own subjects, many soldiers came from Italy, Greece, and other countries, to list in his service. We must not omit observing here, that Dionysius is faid by Diodorus to have invented the quinqueremes about this time, to which he was induced chiefly out of a defire, that the Syracusians should be thought to rival their ancestors in ingenuity; for being apprised, that the triremes, or three-oared vessels, were first made at Corinth, he was desirous the number of oars should be first inlarged by the Syracusians, a colony of the Corintbians x.

all forts of

THE tyrant, having finished his military preparations both by sea and land, and finding his army in a condition to take the field, thought proper now to open his delign to the Syracustans. In order to which he convened the senate, and communi-He acquaints delign to the Syracusians. In order to which he convened the lenate, and community the Syracusians cated his intention to them of attacking the Carthaginian territories instantly, and with his design, even without any previous declaration of war. In vindication of his conduct on this occasion, and to spirit up the assembly, he urged, that the Carthaginians were of all others the most implacable enemies to the Greek nation; that they had then nothing less in view than the conquest of Sicily, and consequently the ruin of all the Greek cities therein; that they would have even been at the gates of Syracuse before that time, had not the plague obliged them to continue in a state of inaction; that as they were c then in a most deplorable condition, no finer opportunity could ever offer itself to the

Syracusians of driving them out of the island than the present; and that lastly, if this was let flip, upon their recovering themselves, they would most certainly put their favourite scheme in execution, and deprive the Syracusians, as well as their neighbours, of every thing that was dear and valuable to them. The assembly, moved who approve of by so pathetic a speech, and influenced by the views of policy more than the dictates it. of justice, readily concurred in his opinion. The antient hatred they bore the Cartheir rage against them for having brought their city under the power of a tyrant, and the hopes they entertained of finding some opportunity of recovering their former liberty, united them in their suffrages, and war was unanimously resolved on. d If they were victorious, they doubted not carrying their point; and if worsted, the tyrant would be so much asraid of a foreign enemy, that he would learn to treat his subjects at home with more moderation. In short, as they sansied themselves to have a prospect of bettering their condition, however the war might turn out, they were for pushing matters to extremity without delay r.

Upon the breaking up of the affembly, Dionyfius, in conformity to the disposi- He fall, upon tion of the Syracustans, gave up to the sury of the populace the persons and posses- the Carthagifions of the Carthaginians, who then refided in Syracuse, and there traded on the nians in Sicily. faith of treaties. As there were many of their ships at that time in the harbour, laden previous declawith cargoes of great value, the people immediately plundered them, and, not con-ration of war.

e tented with this, ranfacked all their houses in a most outrageous manner: and this horrid example of persidiousness and inhumanity was followed throughout the whole island of Sicily; nay, the Greeks inhabiting the cities under the jurisdiction of the Carthaginians, not fatisfied with stripping them of their effects, thought themselves sufficiently authorized to treat the bodies of those miserable wretches with the utmost ignominy and barbarity, to inflict every kind of punishment upon them, in return for the cruelties they had formerly exercised on the natives of the country. This was the bloody fignal of the war that Dionysius now entered into with the Carthagi-

IT has been above observed, that great numbers of mercenaries flocked to Diony-Great numbers f fius from Greece, Italy, and several other countries. The great pay he offered, drew of foreign merthem over in crouds; but no foreign power contributed so much to his support in his service. as the Lacedamonians. From Sparta he received as many recruits as were necessary for the completing of his troops, which, because he apprehended the war with Carthage would be long and bloody, he refolved should be very numerous. That he might be intirely at liberty to act against the common enemy with all his forces, he concluded a peace with the Rhegians and M. flanians. To engage the latter the more He concludes a firmly in his interests, he ceded to them a large extent of territory. This he judged peace with the Rhegians and Rhegians and Rhegians and not ill bestowed at such a critical juncture; for the Messanians, being a sea faring Messanians.

nians levy

Dionytius.

forces to oppose people, and pretty powerful, would have given no small diversion to his arms, had a they joined with the Carthaginians 2.

Dionysius, thus backed by his subjects, mercenaries, and confederates, and finding the vast project he had formed now ripe for execution, dispatched a herald to Carthage, with a letter to the fenate and people, notifying to them, that if they did not forthwith withdraw their garrifons from all the Greek cities in Sicily, the people of Syracuse would treat them as enemies. This letter, being read first in the senate, and afterwards in the affembly of the people, occasioned a general alarm at Carthago, The Cirthagi- which the plague had reduced to a miserable condition. However, though in want of all necessaries, they were not dismayed, but sent officers into Europe, with constderable fums, to raise troops with the utmost diligence. In the mean time they b dispatched orders to their garrisons in Sicily, to observe the motions of the Syracusian army; and appointed Himileo commander in chief of all their forces b.

Dionyfius, without waiting for the answer of the Carthaginians, agreeably to the plan he had laid down, advanced with his army towards mount Eryx, near which stood the city of Motya, a Carthaginian colony of great eminence. This town was defended by a citadel of great strength, and might be justly looked upon as the key of Sicily. The reduction of it therefore, the tyrant very well knew, would be a confiderable blow given the Carthaginians. He was joined on his march by the Greeks of Gela, Camarina, Agrigentum, Himera, and Selinus, out of the ardent desire they had to recover their liberties, and shake off the Carthaginian yoke. With this accesfion of strength, his army amounted to eighty thousand foot, and above three thoufand horse. The fleet consisted of two hundred long galleys, and five hundred transports, laden with warlike engines, and all forts of provisions. The Motyans, by reason of their attachment to the Carthaginians, expected the storm would fall upon them; but, in hopes of relief from Carthage, they were resolved to defend themselves to the last drop of blood. The city stood on a small island, about half a league from shore, to which it was joined by a small neck of land, which the Motyans cut off, to prevent the approaches of the enemy on that side. In it the Carthaginians kept all their stores and provisions. Dionysius therefore opened the campaign with the siege of this place; and after having taken a view of it with his engineers, commanded d the canal between the city and the shore to be filled up with rubbish, and his galleys to anchor at the mouth of the harbour. Having given these orders, he left his brother Leptines, commander in chief of the fleet, to carry on the flege, while he with the land-forces went to reduce the cities in alliance with the Carthaginians, which, tenrified at the approach of so formidable an army, all submitted, except five, viz. Ancyra, Solas, Egefta, Panormus, and Entella. The territories of the Solantines, Panormitans, and Ancyreans, he destroyed with fire and sword, and cut down all their Egesta and Entella he besirged, endeavouring, by repeated attacks, to take them both by form; but not being able to reduce them in so short a time as he wests Motya.

Dionyfius in-places would fall of course, as soon as he had made himself master of this. In the mean time Himilco (F), who was bufy in raifing men, and making other preparations for the war in Sicily, ordered his admiral to let fail from Carthage with ten galleys, and making strait to Syracuse, to destroy all the vessels he should find in that harbour. What he proposed by this was, to divide the enemy's forces, and expected, he returned with his whole army to Motya, not doubting but all other e

Himilco fends ten galleys from Carthage, to destroy the vessels in the harbour of Syracule.

Idem ibid.

b Idem ibid.

(F) This general we have constantly called Imilcar in the history of Syracuse, through mistake, for we are now convinced, that his true name was Himileo. This appears not only from Dudorus Si-eulus, but likewife from Livy, Polyanus, Frontinus, and Orofius. In some editions of Justin he is called Amileo, in others Imileo; but that author is certainly guilty of a mistake, when he makes him the fon of Hamilear, who was killed by Gelon, and skips over a long interval of time, when he will have the destruction of this general's army by the plague immediately to have succeeded the death of Hamilear above-mentioned. Besides, that this was not the same Imilear who commanded in the preceding war, is probable from hence, that Imilear there imagined his collegue Hannibal to have brought the plague into the Carthaginian army, by demoi thing the tombs and monuments of the dead, which he considered as an impious action, and therefore discontinued that demolition; whereas we find, that this Himileo beat down the tombs which stood round the city, in order to fortify his camp, and facultate his approaches. They were therefore probably different persons from this circumstauce; but the authorities produced, without this, put the point beyond dispute (1).

<sup>(1)</sup> Liv. l. xxiv. c. 36. Polyan. fratag. l. v. c. 10. ex. 2. Frontin. firat. l. i. c. 1. ex. 2. Orof. l. iv. Fustin. I. xix.

a oblige Dionysius to fend part of his fleet to the defence of Syracuse. The admiral, pursuant to his orders, entered the harbour in the night, without being discerned by the enemy; and having funk most of the ships he found there, returned to Carthage without the loss of a single man (G). Dionysius, on his return to Motya, having set more hands at work, speedily filled up the canal with heaps of itone and rubbilh, so that he could make his approaches as on dry land. He then perfected the rampart, brought forward his engines, battered the place with his rams, advanced to the walls towers fix stories high, rolled upon wheels, of equal height with their houses, and from thence galled the besieged with continual vollies of arrows and stones discharged from his catapults (H), an engine b at that time of late invention. The place was attacked and defended with the utmost vigour. The Motyans, tho' despairing of any relief, resolved to sell their lives at as dear a rate as possible, knowing they had no quarter to expect from so incensed an enemy; and therefore opposed the besiegers, notwithstanding the imminent danger they were in, with incredible bravery. They posted soldiers armed in coats of mail upon the masts of their ships, who hoisting up their main-yards, threw down burning firebrands, and tow dipped in pitch, upon the engines, which immediately fet them on fire; but the Sicilians, prefently advancing, not only extinguished the slames, but opened several large breaches in the walls, and made a general assault upon the Donysius town with fuch fury, that they bore down all before them. The contest now was attempts to c extremely bloody; for the beliegers, thinking themselves sure of carrying the place, form Motya, and being vastly desirous of taking vengeance of the enemy for the barbarous treatment their nation had formerly received from them, fought like lions; and on the other hand, the belieged, knowing they must fall a victim to an implacable and enraged enemy, if the town was taken by florm, resolved to die valiantly in the defence of the place, and therefore behaved like men in desperation. At last however the Sicilians prevailed, and entered the city fword in hand, thinking they should now speedily accomplish their design; but herein they found themselves deceived, for the Motyans had finished a fortification at the foot of the walls, of equal strength with the walls themselves, which there was a necessity of carrying, before Dionysius d could make himself master of the place. The besieged therefore, after having been obliged to abandon the walls, betook themselves to the desence of this, and gave the Sicilians a warmer reception here than they had met with before, destroying vast numbers of them from the top of the fortification, and the roofs of the houses adjoining to it. However, the Sicilian towers being of a vast height, by their assistance the beliegers advanced their scaling ladders to the neighbouring houses, and by this means fought hand to hand with the belieged. The dispute now was extremely sharp and obstinate; for the Motyans having new life and vigour insused into them by the fight of their wives and children, who, in case of any disaster, they knew would be treated in the fame barbarous manner, as their countrymen taken prisoners e by the Greeks had already been, refolved either to conquer or die. They rushed therefore with a fury little inferior to madness into the midst of their enemies, threw infinite numbers of them headlong from the scaffolds they had erected, and, in fine, repulsed Dionysius with such slaughter, that he was at last obliged to sound the But is vigorously repulsed, e Diod. Sic. ubi sup.

d Idem ibid.

(G) Polyanus tells us, that the admiral ordered the lights to be all placed abaft, or in the sterns of the ships, that no suspicion might be given of their approach; by which means he entered the port in the night undiscovered by the enemy, and easily destroyed the vessels he found there(2).

(H) To what has been lately observed of the catapulta and balista may be added, that from the latter stones of a prodigious size were generally thrown; that the Greek word πέλλη, of which, with the preposition καλά, the word καλαπέλλης or catapulsa is composed, fignifies, according to Helychius, a dart, spear, or javelin; and consequently gives us to understand, that these were the missive weapons discharged most frequently out of that machine. This is confirmed by an allusion to be found in Plantus. Both the catapulta and balifla were of Syrian or Phanician invention, and from those nations the Jews had them, as may be learned from Pliny, in conjunction with scripture. Sicilians introduced them into Greece, in the time of Agefilaus. Upon the first fight of the telum catapulsarium, Archidamus, the son of that prince, is said to have cried out, O ye gods! all valour is now destroyed (3).

(2) Polyan. ubi sup. l vii. c. 56. 2 Chron. xxvi. 15. Plutarch in apophth. Vid. & Jac. Perizonii comment, in Alian. var. hift. l. vi. c. 12. ed. Lugd. Bat. 1701.

(3) Hefych. in voc. πέλ n. Plant. curcul. 5. 3. 11. Lipf. poliorc. 3. 2. Plin.

Vol. VI. Nº 10.

retreat d.

9 G

THE

THE attack was repeated for feveral days fuccessively in the same manner, but a sakes the 10 mm, without any effect; for the Motyans, being accustomed to this way of fighting, constantly repulsed Dionysius, obliging him every evening to draw off. At last Archylus the Thurian, at the head of a choice detachment, in the dead of the night, getting over the shattered houses without noise, possessed himself of a very commodious post, where he made a lodgment, till Dionysius sent another strong body of troops to support him. The Motyans, seeing themselves surprised, made their utmost efforts to dislodge the enemy, so that a fierce encounter ensued. But at last the Sicilians, overpowering them with numbers, gave Dionysius an opportunity of breaking into the city like a torrent with his whole army. Every part of the town was in a moment covered with dead bodies; for the Sicilians, enraged at the obstinate defence b of the besieged, and to retaliate the former cruelties of the Carthaginians, put all the inhabitants to the sword, without distinction of sex or age, those only excepted who took sanctuary in the Greek temples. For Dionysius, being desirous of selling them for flaves, in order to bring money into his coffers, and not being able to restrain the violence of the foldiery, ordered the public crier by proclamation to declare, that he would have the Motyans fly for refuge thither. This put a stop to the flaughter; however, the army thoroughly plundered the town, carrying off from thence an immense quantity of wealth and treasure. This Dionyfius thought proper to permit, that he might ingratiate himself with the troops, and that they might hereby be the more readily induced to fignalize themselves on all future occasions, returns to Syracule.

As many therefore of the Motyans as were left alive, he fold for slaves, but commanded Daimenes, and all the Greeks, who had joined the Carthaginians, to be crucified. As for Archylus, to whose bravery and conduct the taking of the place was in a great measure owing, he rewarded him with an hundred mina's, and all the rest in proportion to their merit. Having thus reduced the strongest city in Sicily Leaves a gar- subject to Carthage, he placed a numerous garrison in it, under the command of one rijon there, and Bito a Syracusian. Afterwards ordering Leptines, with an hundred and twenty gallevs, to watch the Carthaginians at sea, and to make incursions into the territories of Entella and Egesta, which it was his intention to have done himself, would the feason, and the exigence of his affairs, have permitted, summer now drawing to d an end, he returned with his army to Syracuse .

THE Carthaginians having been surprised by Dionysius, in contempt of the faith of treaties, as above related, found it impossible to oblige him to raise the siege of Motya; however, they were willing to attempt, not only this, but even to carry the war to Syracuse. In order to which, Himileo, receiving advice, that Dionysius with his fleet was entered into the harbour, gave orders to have an hundred of his best galleys manned without delay; with which, as the Syracusians had no squadron out at sea to obstruct his design, he entertained hopes either of destroying or making himself master of the tyrant's whole naval force by surprize at one single blow. Could this have been effected, he would not only have relieved the place, but likewise e changed the feat of the war.

SETTING fail therefore from Carthage, after a short passage, he arrived in the night on the coast of Selinus, and the next morning, by break of day, at the port of Motya, where the Syracusian galleys were then riding at anchor. These he imme-Himilco makes diately attacked, burning and finking several of them. Dionysius, not a little alarmed an attempt to at this unexpected visit of the enemy, and seeing, by the dispositions they were making, Surprise Diony his whole seet in danger of being destroyed, advanced with his army to the mouth in the harbour of the harbour; but finding the Carthaginians had possessed themselves of the of Syracuse, passage, he looked upon it as too hazardous an attempt to bring his ships out of port, because the mouth being strait and narrow, a few galleys there might engage f a much superior number with great advantage. Commanding his land-forces therefore to draw them over land into the sea, at a farther distance from the harbour, he by this means preferved them.

In the mean time Himileo, pressing upon those galleys that lay next to him, made all possible efforts to take or destroy them; but was vigorously repulsed, and lost many of his men by showers of darts thrown from the decks. The Syracusian army likewise greatly annoyed him by repeated vollies of arrows from their engines of battery; which being a new kind of weapon, and doing considerable execution,

e Idem ibld.

a struck a great terror into the enemy. Himileo therefore, finding that he could not bring his enterprize to bear, as judging it by no means adviscable to venture an But is obliged engagement with a squadron so much superior to him in strength, lest the Moty- to sheer off.

ans (1) to themselves, and returned to Africa f.

THE following spring Dionysius, drawing his forces out of Syracuse, made an inroad Dionysius into the Carlbaginian provinces, ravaging and destroying the country in a dreadful makes an The Halicyaans, terrified by this irruption, sent embassadors to his camp Carthaginian to implore his protection; but the inhabitants of Egesta, remaining firm in their territories. fidelity to Cartbage, set him at defiance. Upon this, advancing with his army, he laid siege to the place; but the Egestines, making a vigorous and unexpected fally upon the beliegers, put the advanced guards in disorder, and set fire to their tents, b which occasioned a great consternation throughout the whole camp. Several soldiers, in endeavouring to quench the flames, loft their lives, and many horses were burnt. Dionysius, soon after, raising the siege, roved about the country in the same hostile manner as before, and, whilst Leptines was observing the motions of the enemy by sea, continued his depredations without opposition.

Soon after the reduction of Motya, the news of that melancholy event arrived at Carthage; and the year following Himileo was appointed one of the suffectes there. The progress of Dionysius alarming the senate, they resolved to surpass him in numbers both of men and ships; to which end they dispatched officers into all parts of Africa and Spain to raise forces. When the preparations were completed, the c Carthaginian army amounted to above three hundred thousand foot, four thousand horse, and four hundred armed chariots. The sleet, under the command of Mago, consisted of three hundred galleys, and upwards of six hundred ships of burden laden with provisions and engines of war. This is the account given by Ephorus; but Timeus Siculus affirms, that not above a hundred thousand men were transported from Africa into Sicily, who, upon their landing there, were joined by three thou fand Sicilians. The troops being embarqued, and the fleet ready to fet fail, Himilion delivered his orders to the commanders of the fleet fealed up, injoining them not to open them till they were out at sea, and then to observe them with all Arichness. This precaution he took (and it is the first time we find it used) to prevent spies d from informing the enemy of his deligns. The orders were, that they should make strait to Panormus, which was appointed the place of the general rendezvous, and thither they steered their course with a fair wind. The transports, getting out into the open sea, outsailed the galleys, which kept close to the coast of Africa; but being destitute of a convoy, were attacked off of Panormus by Leptines, whom Dio-Leptines nyfius had sent out with thirty sail against them. After a short dispute, he sunk fifty defeats the of them, in which five thousand men and two hundred chariots were lost; the rest, enemy by sea. tacking about, had the good luck to escape. As soon as the galleys appeared, Leptines retired; and Himileo, having landed his troops at Panormus, marched directly against the enemy, commanding the fleet to sail along the coast near the army. e On his march he took Eryx by treachery; and hastening from thence to Motya, The Carthagireduced that important place, before Dionysius, who was then besieging Egesta, could nians retake fend any forces to its relief 8. THE Sicilian troops were very eager for venturing a battle with the Carthaginians, in order to decide the fate of Sicily as foon as possible; but Dionysius thought it more adviseable to abandon the open country to the enemy, because he was at a great distance from his confederates, and began to be in want of provisions. He exhorted the Sicani to leave their cities, and join the army, promifing them, after the conclusion of the war, a richer and more fertile country than their own, and to permit

f Idem ibid. & Polyen. ftrat. l.v. c. 2. ex. 6. ex. 2. FRONTIN. Arat. l. i. c. 1. ex. 2.

ş١

DIOD. Sic. ubi sup. POLYAN. strat. L. v. c. 10.

(I) Polyanus intimates, that, upon the approach of the Carshaginian fleet, Dionysus drew off his torces from before the town, and advanced at the head of them to the shore, as near the enemy's vesfels as possible. By this motion he endeavoured to encourage his soldiers and mariners. Under the promontory that formed the port, there was a tract of ewenty stadia in breadth, perfectly level, and full of mud. Over this his foldiers and mariners drew eighty triremes in one day, which threw the Car-thaginians into a great consternation. The admiral destroy it, immediately set sail, and left the Mosyans to the mercy of the enemy (4).

therefore, fearing the Syracufians would first block up his seet in the mouth of the harbour, and then as many of them as would chuse it, to return to their former habitations. Some a few, for fear of being plundered, listened to this proposal; but the greatest part of them deserted to the enemy, together with the Halicyaans, who sent embassadors to Carthage, to renew their antient alliance with that state. Dionysius, not meeting with a sufficient reinforcement, and in consequence of the resolution he had taken, marched with great precipitation to Syracuse, plundering and laying waste the country all along as he passed. Himilco, stushed with his success, advanced towards Messana, of which city he was very defirous to possess himself, on account of its situation; for being once mafter of it, he could eafily intercept all fuccours fent to the enemy, either from Italy or Greece; and besides, the haven was capable of receiving his whole fleet, which confisted of fix hundred fail and upwards. Before he invested b the city, he concluded a treaty with the people of Himera and Cephaladium, and reduced the city of Lipara (K), the capital of the island of that name, putting it under contribution, by which he exacted from the inhabitants thirty talents. From thence moving with his forces towards Messana, his fleet at the same time attending him, he encamped upon the promontory of Peloris, now the Capo di Faro, about an hundred stadia from that city. When the inhabitants heard of the approach of the enemy, they could not agree among themselves about the measures to be taken on that occasion. Some, alarmed at the great strength of the Carthaginians, seeing themselves deserted by their confederates, as well as in great want of their horse, which were then at Syracuse, and knowing that the walls were in a ruinous condition, c and that they had not time then to make the necessary preparations for their defence, were for submitting to the enemy. Others were resolved to hold out to the last, and chearfully facrifice their lives in the maintenance of their liberties. They were encouraged to this resolution by an ancient prophecy, whereby it was foretold, That the Carthaginians should be one day carriers of water in that city. This they interpreted, as if the Carthaginians should be slaves in Messana; and being thereby greatly animated, were determined to undergo all extremities, rather than furrender themfelves to the common enemy. Their wives and children, with all their treasures, they fent to the neighbouring towns, before the place was invested .

And advance afterwards to Messana.

Which place Himilco invests.

In order to prevent any incursions of the enemy, they sent a strong detachment d of the flower of their troops towards the promontory of Peloris, who for some time defended the frontiers. But Himilco, rightly concluding, that the garrison must be greatly weakened by the absence of this detachment, and that the city was thereby lest so very much exposed on the sea-side, that it would be no difficult matter for his sleet to enter, commanded two hundred galleys to advance towards the town. His orders were instantly obeyed, and, a north wind at that time blowing fresh,

b Dion. Sic. ubi fup.

(K) Lipara was the principal of the Eolian islands, in number seven, not far from the north coast of Sicily. The names of these islands were Strongyle, Evonymos, Didyme, Phænicusa, Hiera, Vulcania, and Lipara (1). According to Diodorus, both the island Lipara, and its capital city, received their name from Liparus, the son of Auson (2), king of these islands, who built the city Lipara, and cultivated all of them. The Liparese were antiently formidable, had a good sleet, and grew very rich, by reason of the great revenue brought them in by alum, with which mineral their island (3) abounded. Their capital city, according to Diodorus, was beautised with large and fair harbours, and famous for the baths in its neighbourhood, which were medicinal, and of singular service to the people of Sicily, when seized with any strange and unusual disease. Pliny makes Eolous to have preceded Liparus in this island; but Diodorus tells us, that Eolus married Cyane, the daughter of Liparus, and, in right of his wife, succeeded that prince. About the fistieth olympiad, a colony of Cnidians, (4), under their captains Gorgus, Thesior, and Epithersides, entered into a league with the antient inhabitants, and incorporated themselves with them. Lipara was noted amongst the antients for the great quantity of delicious fruit it produced, and is at this day remarkable for the excellent railins it supplies several parts of Europe with, particularly England. That the inhabitants were pretty opulent in the times we are now speaking of, is evident from the contributions which Dionysius exacted of them, amounting to about five thousand four hundred pounds sterling. It must be observed, that Diodorus, not only here, but in other passages, where he mentions a talent, means the Attic talent, which was worth about an hundred and eighty pounds(5) of our money, and not the Sicilian, amounting not to above three Roman denarii, or a two thousandth part (6) of the Attic. The island is now called Lipari, and has its capital fo fortified, that it stood a short siege in the year 1719, when it was taken by an Imperial detachment under the command of general Seckendorf; as was likewise the castle, whose garrison of four hundred men thought proper to furrender the next day at discretion.

<sup>(1)</sup> Strab. l. vi. Diod. Sic. l. v. c. 1. Pomp. Mel. l. ii. c, 7. Strab. l. vi. & alib. Plin. l. iii. c. 9.
(2) Diod. Sic. ubi sup.
(3) Strab. Plin. & Diod. Sic. ubi sup.
(4) Diod. Sic. ubi sup.
(5) Fest. subi voc. Talentum.
(6) Aristot. apud Jul. Pol. l. ix. c. 6. & Fest. ubi sup. See Univ. hist. vol. iii. p. 10.

a they were carried with a full gale directly into the harbour. The Meffanians, being now sensible of their mistake, recalled their detachment; but it was too late, for the fleet had already entered, and having a great number of engines on board, battered down the walls on that fide, upon which the inhabitants haftened in crouds thither to defend the breaches, leaving the other parts of the wall quite unguarded. Himileo took advantage of this confusion, and attacking the city on the land-side, entered it And takes it. without opposition. All those who were on the ramparts died valiantly on the spot; the others either fled to the neighbouring cities, or fell into the hands of the enemy, or, getting into narrow creeks about the harbour, threw themselves into the sea, imagining they could reach the opposite shore; of which however not above a fourth b part made their escape to the coast of Italy. Himilco entered Messana with his whole army, and, in order to render his conquest complete, proposed reducing all the forts and castles in the neighbourhood of that city; but upon taking a view of them, and finding them extremely strong, he altered his measures, and returned back to Messana. Here he halted a short time to refresh and recruit his army, and then marched at the head of all his forces against Syracuse.

Himileo, considering that Messana was very remote from the cities held by the Car- He orders it to thaginians, and the most commodious port in Sicily on account of its situation, had, be razed. before his departure, ordered it to be razed, that it might be of no advantage to the enemy. His orders were executed with the utmost severity, infomuch that there c was not left one house standing in the whole city; nay, Diodorus tells us, that scarce any traces of it remained, the very rubbish being carried away, and thrown into the fea; which sufficiently discovered the implacable hatred Himileo, as well as the whole Carthaginian nation, bore to the Greeks i.

THE Siculi having Dionysius in perfect detestation, and a fair opportunity now Most of the offering of shaking off their allegiance to him, all of them, except the Assarines, Siculi revolt revolted to the Carthaginians. Dionysius, being hereby deprived of the means of from Dionyraising recruits, was obliged to present all the slaves and servants of the Syracusians with their liberty, and with them he manned fixty galleys. He received likewise a supply of a thousand men from the Lacedæmonians, his antient and faithful allies. d Expecting that the enemy would advance into his territories, he took care to fortify the castles and forts of the Syracusians, and the cities in their dependence, and to store them with provisions. Those of the Leontini, which were his principal magazines, he rendered extremely strong, and persuaded the Campanians to leave Catana, the place he had given them to reside in, and remove to the city of Æina, a fortress of great strength, for their farther security k.

Dionysius, upon a review of his land-forces, found them to amount to thirty thou. Not with stand fand foot, and above three thousand horse. With these he took the field, and ing which, he encamped near a place called Taurus (L), about an hundred and fixty stadia from wards the Car-

Syracuse. thaginians.

1 Idem ibid.

k Idem ibid.

(L) This Taurus was undoubtedly the mountain of that name, upon the declivity of which stood the famous city of Taurominium. According to Diodorus (1), a great number of Sicilians had fixed their habitations here before the time of this war. Dionysius had given the country of the Nazians to thele Sicilians; but they, induced by the promises of Himileo, now dwelt upon this hill, which was naturally fortified. The same author adds, that, as they had fettled here in times antecedent to this war, fo they continued there after it, and inhabited the city called Taurominium, from its fituation upon mount We learn farther from this historian (2), that Andromachus, the father of Timau: Siculus, about forty years after the commencement of this war, affembled all the fugitives of Naxos, a city which Dionysius the tyrant had destroyed, and settled them on this hill, and that this was the origin of Taurominium. These two accounts seem to clash, since the first makes the foundation of Taurominium to have happened in the first year of the ninety-sixth

1 1

ole ole

10

Ţ,

olympiad, whereas the latter fixes it in the third of the hundred and-fixth. The learned Dr. Bentley (3) takes the former to be nearer the truth, though he endeavours to make them both confiftent with one another. Cluverius indeed prefers the latter, but in this he seems to have Diodorus against him; for that author calls the place Taurominium three several times, before he makes the least mention of Andromachus, viz. at olymp. XCVI. an. 1.(4) olymp. XCVI. an. 3.(5) and olymp. XCVII. an. 1.(6) However this may be, that the Tauromenites were descended from the Naxians, cannot be disputed. Pliny and Solinus fay expresly, that Taurominium was the city which was formerly called Naxos. The medals of the Tauromenites clearly evince the same thing; for there are five several pieces in Paruta, that have on one side TAYPOMENITAN, and on the reverse Apollo's head with this inscription, APXATETA, and that Apollo 'Agxayeras was a deity of the Naxians, we are informed by Thucydides (7) and Appian (8). To conclude, our author Diodorus himself, in the place

(1) Diod. Sic. l. xiv. c. 7. (2) Idem, l. xvi. c. 2. Phal. p. 182, 183. (7) Thucyd. c. 6. (4) Diod. Sic. l. xiv. c. 7. (8) Appian. de bel. civil. Vol. VI. Nº 10.

(3) Dr. Bentley in his differt. upon the epift. of . (5) Idem ibid, c. 10. (6) Idem ibid. c. 11.

9 H

Syracuse. His fleet, by the accession of the fixty galleys above-mentioned, consisted a of an hundred and eighty galleys. Himilco, upon advice of his march, advanced to meet him, his land army being attended by the fleet, which kept near the coast. When the Carthaginians arrived at Naxos, they could not continue any longer their march by the sea-side, but were obliged to take a long compass round mount Æinas which, by a violent eruption, had covered all the neighbouring country with burning ashes, and rendered the roads impassable by its staming inundations. Himiko therefore ordered Mago to fail to Catana, and there wait, till he, marching through the heart of the country, should rejoin him with the land-forces. Dionysius, apprised of this, hastened with all speed to Catana, with a design to attack Mago, before Himilco's army came up; he hoped that his land-forces drawn up on the shore would b greatly encourage his own mariners, and discourage the enemy's: besides, if his fleet were worsted, both ships and men had a place of safety to retire to. This was what Himileo had foreseen, when, for the reason above-mentioned, his sleet and landforces were obliged to separate 1.

His flect, under the command of Leptines,

Dionysius having therefore drawn up his army on the shore, sent out Leptines with the whole fleet against the enemy, commanding him to engage in close order, and engages that of not to break his line upon any account what soever. And indeed such a salutary order the Carthagi- could not have been too punctually obeyed at that juncture, on account of Mago's great superiority; for his fleet was composed of no less than five hundred ships of burden, besides a vast number of galleys with brazen beaks. The Carthaginians, c feeing the Greek troops drawn up on the shore, and the navy advancing in good order against them, were struck with terror, and tacking about, began to make to the shore, with a design to save themselves over land, and join Himileo; but recollecting that this was equally, if not more dangerous, they resolved to try their fortune by sea; and accordingly drawing themselves up in a line, they waited for the enemy. Leptines, inconsiderately advancing with thirty of his best galleys, contrary to the express command of Dionysius, fell upon Mago's first squadron, and after a brisk action, sunk feveral of the ships, of which it was composed; but Mago, coming up with the whole fleet, immediately furrounded him, upon which, notwithstanding the inequality of numbers, a most sharp and bloody engagement ensued.

> THE Carthaginian and Syracusian galleys grappling with one another, (for they were fo close together, that there was no room for them to strike with their beaks) the forces on board fought hand to hand, as if in a battle on land. On both fides they made the utmost efforts to board their enemies, and consequently on both sides many were thrown over-board and flain. In fine, Leptines, though for feveral hours he defended himself perfectly well, being at last overpowered, was obliged to fly, valour being forced to give way to numbers. The flight of the admiral disheartened the Syracustans, and gave the enemy fresh courage; the former therefore sled to the shore, where their land-forces were drawn up, but were closely pursued by the Carthaginians. Many, abandoning their ships, threw themselves into the sea, hoping to save e their lives by swimming to the shore; but the Carthaginian transports, which lay near the shore, having manned their boats, made a dreadful havock of those unhappy men, when they were not in a condition to make any resistance; so that the land-army faw them perish, without being able to give them the least relief. The Carthagi-

And is defeated.

1 Idem ibid.

we are now upon, just after mentioning the city Taurominium, observes that "Himilco marched " with great expedition to the aforesaid place of "Naxia." Probably Naxia here is a corruption of Naxos, fince, if we remember right, Naxia, as the name of a place, is not to be met with in any other author, nor any-where else in Diodorus but here. This passage seems fully to prove, not only that the Naxians were the progenitors of the Tauromenites, but likewise that, in the first year of the ninety-fixth Olympiad, the city, or spot where it afterwards stood, was called Naxos or Naxia. As therefore it appears from another place (9) in Diodorus, that the city was but just built in the third year of the same olympiad, it feems clearly to follow, that Taurominium was founded in the first year of the ninety-fixth olympiad. This is an additional argument in fixth olympiad. This is an additional argument in favour of what Dr. Bentley has advanced, and, to all appearance, intirely fixes the point. We must not omit observing, that Taurominium stood at a considerable distance from the antient Naxos, the one being fituated either on the declivity or top of the hill, and the other much lower towards the fou-thern foot of it (10). 'Tis likely there might have been a town of the same name with the hill, either upon it, or somewhere near the foot of it, as we find Æina was the name both of a mountain, and a town in its neighbourhood. If Dionysius did not ascend any part of the mountain, we may suppose him to have encamped near this town.

a nians sustained great loss in this action; but above an hundred of the Syracusian galleys were either funk or taken, and more than twenty thousand of their men killed in the battle or pursuit. After the action was over, the Carthaginian fleet anchored at Catana, where they refitted the Syracusian ships they had taken. This was done to regale the eyes and ears of the Carthaginians and their confederates, who could not but be highly delighted with fuch a trophy, as it enabled them to form some fort of an idea of the great victory they had obtained m.

Upon this misfortune, the Sicilians, apprehending they should be reduced to great streights by returning to Syracuse, and there sustaining a siege, solicited Dionysus to fight Himilco, alledging, that an unexpected attack at the present juncture would b strike terror into the Carthaginians, and give them a fair opportunity of retrieving their late loss. This project seemed the more feasible, as the enemy could not but be extremely fatigued with their long and hasty march; and therefore Dionysius at first not only listened to it, but ordered his forces to be ready to march at a minute's warning. But when he was just upon the point of putting it in execution, some of his friends remonstrating to him, that Mago in the mean time with his victorious fleet might possess himself of Syracuse, he altered his resolution, and hastened with Dionysius his whole army to the defence of that metropolis. To this he was likewise strongly returns with induced by the fate of Messana, which had lately been lost by such a point of false Syracuse. conduct as the Sicilians proposed to him. However, many of these, being displeased c at his not falling into their measures, deserted, and either retired to the neighbouring garrisons of the Carthaginians, or withdrew to their respective homes n.

Himilco, in two days march, arriving at Catana, ordered the ships there to be drawn Himilco eninto the harbour, that they might be sheltered from the weather, which was then deavours to exvery boisterous and stormy. Here he halted some time to refresh his troops, and cite the Campanius of fent embassiadors to the Campanians at Æina to excite them to a revolt, promising Ætna to a them large possessions, and that they should be equal sharers in all the spoils taken revolt. from the Sicilians. That his promifes might make the deeper impression, he took care to inform them, that the Campanians of Entella had declared for the Carthaginians, and joined them with a confiderable body of forces. In fine, he defired d them to consider, that the Greeks of every denomination bore an implacable hatred to all other nations whatsoever. The Campanians were not a little moved by these promifes and fuggestions; but as they had given hostages to Dionysius, and sent the flower of their troops to Syracuse, they were obliged, contrary to their inclination, to adhere to the treaty concluded with him o.

THE Carthaginian general, animated with the good fuccess that attended his arms, He invests marched strait to Syracuse with a design to besiege it; while his sleet, under the Syracuse and command of Mago, sailed along the coast, carrying great plenty of provisions for takes up his. command of Mago, failed along the coast, carrying great plenty of provisions for takes up his the substitute of so numerous an army. The arrival of the enemy threw the city temple of juinto the utmost consternation. Two hundred and eighty galleys laden, and richly piter. e adorned with the spoils of the enemy, and advancing in good order, entered in a fort of triumph the great haven of Syracuse, and were followed by above a thousand transports with more than five hundred soldiers on board; so that the harbour, capacious as it was, could hardly contain fo great a navy, confisting in the whole of near two thousand fail. The fleet had scarce cast anchor, when the army appeared on the other fide, amounting, according to some authors, to three hundred thousand foot, and three thousand horse, besides an additional squadron, of two hundred long ships, attending them. Himilco took up his quarters in the temple of Jupiter, and the rest of the army encamped round it, about twelve stadia from the city P.

BEFORE he directly formed the siege, he advanced with his army in battalia to He takes by the very walls of the city, and offered the Syracusians battle. But finding they were assault the prudent enough to decline accepting the challenge, he returned to his camp, well fuburb of Acrafatisfied at his having extorted from them a tacit confession of their own weakness, and his superiority. At the same time he ordered an hundred of his best galleys to enter the two other harbours, viz. the little port and that of Trogilus, to strike more terror into the enemy, and convince them, that the Carthaginians were likewise masters at sea. In order to gain the affection of his troops, as well as to distress the enemy, he ravaged and laid waste the country many miles round for thirty days

m Dion. Sic. ubi sup.

Idem ibid.

Idem ibid.

P Idem ibid.

together, cutting down their groves, and doing infinite damage to the inhabitants. 2 He took by affault the quarter, or suburb, of the town called Acradina, where he plundered the rich temples of Ceres and Proferpina, and, in short, succeeded in every measure he pursued for streightening the besieged. Elated with this run of good-fortune. he looked upon himself in effect as master of the place, though he was apprehensive, that the intire reduction of it would be the work of a confiderable time. He erected therefore three forts near the sea at equal distances from each other, one at Plemmyrium, another about the middle of the port, and the third near the temple of Jupiter, in which he laid up vast stores of provision, and all other necessaries, that might enable him to push on the siege. In order to facilitate his approaches, and fortify his camp in the most commodious manner, he ordered all the tombs, which stood round the b city, to be demolished, and amongst others that of Gelon, and his wife Damareta, which was a monument of great magnificence. Being very intent on the preservation of his troops, he took care they should want nothing that was proper for their subsistence, and therefore sent transports to Sardinia and Africa for a fresh supply of corn and other provisions. In the mean time the Syracusians, though greatly dejected by their late misfortunes, did not despond, Dionysius being in daily expectation of receiving a confiderable reinforcement from his foreign allies 9.

The Carthaginians are worsted in an action by sea.

BEFORE the storm fell upon Syracuse, Dionysius had fent his (M) kinsman Polyxenus to implore the affiftance of the Italians, Corintbians, and Lacedamonians, against the power of Carthage, which alone he found himself unable to withstand. He like- c wife had dispatched several officers with large sums to Peloponnesus, to raise a body of mercenaries there. All these, returning some time after Himileo had sat down before Syracuse, brought with them, besides some land-forces, a supply of thirty galleys under the command of Pharacidas the Lacedamonian. Soon after Dionysius and Leptines went out upon a cruise, intending, if possible, to intercept some of the Carthaginian transports laden with provisions, of which the city then stood in great They were scarce out of port, when the Syracusians from the city spied one of the transports coming up to Himilco's camp, upon which venturing out with five galleys, they took it. As they were failing away with their prize, the Carthaginians gave them chase with forty sail, against which they advanced with their whole d fleet, and engaging them with great resolution, took the admiral galley, besides several others, and sunk or damaged twenty more. The rest they pursued to the place where their whole fleet rode, offering them battle a second time. The Carthaginians, terrified with this unexpected difaster, kept within the harbour, though their fleet was three times more numerous than the enemy's who challenged them. The Syracustans, fastening the galleys they had taken to the poops of their ships, brought them off triumphantly to the town.

What happened now to the Carthaginians verified the observation, that missortunes feldom come alone. Himilco, who, from his first arrival in the island to this time, had been successful in every measure, and the constant savourite of foretune in all his undertakings, was soon to be reduced to the lowest degree of ignominy and difference, and his people to the extremest misery. All the splendor of his anticipated triumph vanished in a moment, and served only to enhance his suture missortunes. This, according to the judicious resection of our historian, may serve as a lively lesson to mankind, to teach them, that the proudest mortal, how great soever he may be, is but an inconsiderable creature, and may be blasted in an instant

9 Diop. Sic. ubi fup.

* Idem ibid.

(M) The Greek word is xnd'ssins, which Rhodomanus has falfly translated focar or father-in-law. It is a general term, and denotes any person who is related to another by marriage. Sometimes however it is equivalent to the Latin focar, and sometimes to gener, as we learn from Stephanus and Budeus, who produce instances of both those significations. But that it is to be used in a general sense here, is evident from Diodorus himself, who tells us elsewhere, that Polyxenus was uncle to Dionysius's wife, and that that tyrant gave him his own sister in marriage. Such a complex relation as this cannot be expressed by any one particular word in our language, and therefore we have rendered it by the general term kinsman. We mention this only to have an opportunity of suggesting to our readers, that many faults and inaccuracies are to be found in Rhodomanus's edition of Diodorus Siculus, which yet is the best we at present have; so that it were to be wished some able hand would give us a new edition of that useful and entertaining historian (1).

<sup>(1)</sup> Steph. in thefaur. ling. Grac. Bud. in lex. ed. Baf. 1572. Diod. Sic. l. xiii. See also Univ. hist. vol. iii. P. 53.

a by a superior power. Here we may behold the Carthaginians from the summit of human felicity hurled down into the abyss of calamity and wo; from the most potent and formidable state in all the western parts of the world, become the most weak and contemptible of all nations, and that, as it were, in an instant. However, Providence did not so far favour the perfidious Syracufians, but that their enemies, though treacherous and cruel in many respects, recovered themselves, and came off with reputation at the conclusion of this war '.

Himileo, now mafter of almost the whole island of Sicily, and expecting with great The plague impatience to crown his other conquests with the reduction of Syracuse, was obliged breaks out in the Carthagito desift from all further operations against that city by the plague, which, breaking mian army, and b out in the camp, made great havock amongst his soldiers. This infection was makes dreadful looked upon as a punishment inflicted upon them by the gods for plundering the havock there temples, particularly those of Ceres and Proserpina above-mentioned, and demolishing the tombs round the city, which was confidered as a violence offered to the dead. But, without having recourse to the extraordinary interposition of the gods, they might have ascribed it, as Diodorus infinuates, to natural causes; for the heats that fummer, in the midst of which this pestilential distemper first broke out, were more excessive than they had ever been known in the memory of man; and the adjacent country abounded with fens and marshes, whose unwholsome exhalations, especially at that hot season, which of itself was almost sufficient to have occasioned the c plague, must have had a very ill effect upon the camp, where such an infinite number of people were crouded together: and that these in fact were the two principal concurring causes of that dire malady, is apparent from hence, that the Athenians, who spared both temples and tombs, had been, not long before, afflicted with the fame calamity. It began among the Africans, and soon spread through the whole army. As this plague was attended with some uncommon symptoms, carried off above an hundred and fifty thousand men in a very short time, and may be looked upon as one of the most malignant distempers to be met with in history, we shall beg leave here to give a brief account of it, believing, that such a short digression will not be unacceptable to our curious readers '. BEFORE sun-rising, the patients were seized with a convulsive shuddering, pretty A description nearly resembling that attending the rigor or cold fit in agues, which happens in the of this most beginning of the paroxysm. This was in part occasioned by the fresh breezes coming off from the sea, which at that time of the morning were very piercing. As the fun advanced nearer the meridian, the cold remitted, and the heat grew more intense; so that by noon they found themselves almost suffocated with heat; which made them excessively weak and faint, but gave fresh force and malignity to the disease. The fouth wind moreover greatly increasing the infection, they died in such numbers, that, after some time, it was impossible to inter them; nay, the persons attending the fick were cut off in fuch a manner, that no one durft approach the infected. In e the first stage of the distemper, they were afflicted with catarrhs, swellings of the throat, &c. These were succeeded by violent dysenteries, raging severs, acute pains in all parts of the body, loathsome ulcers, &c. Some were even seized with madness and fury, falling upon all those that came in their way, and tearing them to pieces. No relief could be had from the physician (A), this terrible malady eluding all his art; so that those infected with it expired the fifth or fixth day in exquisite torture. Justin seems to intimate, that almost the whole Carthaginian army perished by it, and that in a manner all at once, as it were in an instant; which may serve to give

* Idem ibid.

t Idem ibid.

(A) It appears from the antient historians, that the plague raged pretty frequently amongst the Car-thaginians, especially in their African dominions: and it is worthy observation, that those parts are still often visited by that terrible malady, particularly Algiers, Tunis, &c. It is probable, that the Carthaginians brought the feeds of the distemper with them out of Africa, fince the petitlence had made great havock there just before the breaking out of this war; which Dionysius (1) urged as a reason to the Syracusians for his attacking the Car-

ch

叫

Ċ

29

thaginians, whom he supposed to have been there-by extremely weakened. It may be inferred from this paffage, that the Carthaginians had physicians with them in their camps, and confequently that the art of physic was not unknown to that people. This likewise in some measure appears from the worship of Esculapius (2), which prevailed in the territories subject to the state of Carthage, though at what degree of persection herein the students arrived, we cannot pretend to fay.

(1) Diod. Sic. 1 xiv. c. 7. (2) Appian. in Libyc. Diod. Sic. Serv. aliique multi. Vol. VI. Nº 10. 9 I us an idea of the great malignity of it. Diodorus however informs us, that a considerable body of Africans and Iberians survived this dreadful calamity; though he at the same time affirms, that an hundred and fifty thousand carcasses of those who perished did not meet with any interment, and consequently infinuates, that a greater number died, since, according to the same author, the dead were buried for some time after the breaking out of the infection. It is worthy observation, that not a single person of those who attended the sick escaped.

Dionyfius attack, the enemy, and defeats them.

Dionystus, being apprised of the deplorable condition to which the Carthaginians were reduced, resolved not to let slip so favourable an opportunity of attacking them. Having therefore manned eighty galleys, he ordered Pharacidas and Leptines to fall upon the enemy's fleet at break of day, while he attacked the land-forces in the b With this view, having affembled his troops before the moon was up, he advanced to the temple of Cyane, and fetting out from thence about midnight, without being discovered, arrived at the enemy's camp by the time appointed. He then detached a throng body of cavalry, and a thousand of the mercenary foot, with orders to fall upon that part of the camp, which lay at the greatest distance, pretending, that the enemy there kept no guard; but his real defign was to get rid of that body of mercenaries, they having a great aversion to him, and being ready to mutiny on all occasions. Accordingly he gave private instructions to the officers of the horse to retire as foon as the infantry was engaged. His orders were obeyed, and the mercenaries, being surrounded on all sides, were cut off to a man. Dionysius, upon the c return of the cavalry, at the same time attacked the enemy's camp, and the forts in their possession. The suddenness of the attack so surprised the Carthaginians, that they were some time before they could put themselves into a posture of desence, which gave him an opportunity of taking the fort called Polichna by storm; and the horse at the same time advancing in good order, with some galleys, to that near Dascon, likewise carried it. By the reduction of these forts, the Syracusians were enabled to enter the great haven with all their fleet, and to fall furiously on the enemy's galleys anchored there. The Carthaginians in the camp for some time defended themselves with great bravery; but feeing their navy now in imminent danger of being utterly destroyed, many of them, abandoning the defence of the camp, hastened to the d shore, to the relief of their companions on board the vessels. But all their endeavours were ineffectual; for the Carthaginian ships, not being able to sustain the shock of the Syracusian galleys, many of them were sunk at the first attack, others quite disabled, and a great number burnt and taken. The flaughter on this occasion was so dreadful, that the shore was covered with dead bodies; which afforded a melancholy spectacle to Himilco, and filled all the Carthaginians with great horror, who, bewailing their unhappy fate, were now reduced to a state of desperation. In the mean time the camp, being deferted by the body of troops above-mentioned, was left very much exposed; which Dionysius taking advantage of, redoubled his efforts, and finding but a feeble refistance, soon broke into it, putting all to the sword who opposed him. After this, he moved with his forces towards the gulf of Dascon, where e finding forty Carthaginian ships of fifty oars apiece, with a great number of transports, and some galleys, he immediately set fire to them. This completed the destruction of the enemy's fleet; for the wind being at that time very high, and the cables of many of the ships burnt, they were all, excepting a few that were afterwards taken, either contumed by the violence of the flames, or, falling foul one upon another, broken to pieces. Diodorus fays, that when the ships were all in a blaze, and the flames afcending above the mafts, a most dreadful scene was exhibited, the gods themselves feeming to destroy the enemy with lightning from heaven; which punishment, he infinuates, they deserved, on account of their great impiety. Such a spirit of joy and gladness distused itself over the whole city on this happy occasion, that old and f young, women and children, in fine, almost all the inhabitants of Syracuse, posted to the walls and eminencies in the greatest hurry, to be spectators of so glorious a victory: at the sight of which, listing up their hands to heaven, they thanked the tutelary gods of the city, for revenging in so signal a manner the many facrileges, which the Carthaginians had committed since their arrival in Sicily. Night putting an end to this action, Dionysius, with his troops, retired, and encamped near the

Justin. l. xix. Diop. Sic. ubi fup. Oros. l. iv.

a enemy at the temple of Jupiter, with a delign to renew the fight early the next morning w (B).

THOUGH Dionysius penetrated into the Carthaginian camp, put great numbers of the enemy there to the fword, and even intirely ruined their fleet, yet he could not, by this last effort, oblige them absolutely to raise the siege: this he reserved to the day following. But Himilco, taking the opportunity of this short respite, sent em- Himilco with bailadors privately to him, offering him three hundred talents (C), all the ready great difficulty cash he had then with him, if he would permit the remains of his shattered army to makes his return to Africa. Dionysius was unwilling utterly to destroy the Carthaginians, lest the Syracufians, when free from the apprehensions of so formidable an enemy, should b feek to regain their antient liberty, and thereby give him fresh disturbance; but, on the other side, he knew, that neither the Syracusians, nor their confederates, would fusfer him to grant the enemy such terms: he therefore replied, that it was not in his power to permit them all to retire; but that he would allow Himileo, with all the citizens of Carthage, to depart in the night, upon his paying three hundred This being agreed to, Dionysius retired with his forces into the city, whither Himi co privately fent him the promifed fum, and then began to make the necessary preparations for his departure. The fourth night after the agreement, Himileo, with forty galleys full of the citizens of Carthage, was ready to fet fail, leaving the rest of the army behind him. But the Corintbians, who served under Dionysius, discovering, c from the noise and motion of the vessels, that Himileo and his friends were making off, fent to acquaint the tyrant with their flight, who immediately ordered some galleys to be manned, as if he designed to prevent their retreat; but as his orders were but flowly executed, they grew impatient, and, without his permission, gave them chace; and coming up with the rear, by piercing them with the beaks of their vessels, sunk several of them. Upon the deseat of the Carthaginians, the Siculi, who joined them, dispersed, and slying through the heart of the country, retired to their respective homes. In the mean time Dionysius posted detachments at all the avenues leading to the enemy's camp, that none of those lest behind might make their escape; and marching by night with his forces, took possession of it. This he met with no d opposition in doing; for the Africans, finding themselves betrayed by Himileo and the Carthaginians, and that the Sicilians had deferted them, were thrown into fuch a left in the camp, were delivered up as plunder to the foldiery x. This victory was the more extraordinary, inalmuch as before the plague broke out in the Carthaginian camp, Dionysius found himself reduced to the last extremity, e and actually consulted with his friends about the most proper method of making his escape. In this melancholy situation, his friend Ellopides advised him to resume his courage, and by no means to renounce his fovereignty, telling him, that the royal title would be the greatest ornament of his sepulchre. The tyrant closed with this advice, and, notwithstanding the Siculi had joined the enemy, by the incident abovementioned, became victorious. Diodorus and Plutarch both omit this circumstance, consternation, that they immediately dispersed, taking a great variety of routs. Being therefore incapable of making any resistance, they either sell into the hands of the above-mentioned detachments, or furrendered to Dionysius himself at discretion. But the Iberians, keeping together in a body, fent a herald to capitulate with *Diony*fius, who took them into his fervice. All the enemy's baggage, and valuable effects w Dion. Sic. ubi sup.

* Idem ibid. c. 7.

(B) Polyanus seems to intimate, that Dionysius amused the Carthaginians with some proposals for an accommodation, and at the same time offered to deliver into their hands a great number of castles and fortresses, if they would put garrisons into them. The Carthaginians, closing with this offer, posted great numbers of their troops, according to our author, in those places; but hereby so weakened their army, that Dionysius found himself strong enough to arrack them; which he did, and gained a complete victory. If we admit this story to be true, which perhaps our readers may scruple doing, fince Diodorus Siculus, Justin, and Orosius, have passed it over in filence, it is probable the stratagem was made use of after the plague had made great havock in the Carthaginian camp; for Himilto's forces were at first so vastly superior in strength to Dionysius's army, even according to Polyanus himself, that he might have garrisoned all the fortresses becausing to the Superior and yet have been much longing to the Syracusians, and yet have been much more than a match for Dionysius (1).

(C) According to what we have lately observed, this was about fifty-four thousand pounds sterling; which was no extraordinary fum for the military cheft, confidering what a numerous army Himilco

(1) Polyan. strat. l. v. c. 2. ex. 9. Vide etiam Sex. Jul. Frontin. strat. l.i. c. 8. ex. 11.

though the former of those historians mentions something of this nature to have hap- a pened to the tyrant upon the revolt of the Syracusian army, when he was shut up in his capital city. However, Ijocrates, an author of undoubted credit, who lived at the time of the transaction, has furnished us with this fragment of history, which has likewise been transcribed by Ælian; so that we shall make no scruple to insert it

Thus ended this campaign, one of the most remarkable, for the variety of incidents, and viciffitudes of fortune observable in it, to be met with in history. A large field for reflections here opens itself; but as these have been already in some measure anticipated, and as our province is chiefly confined to facts, we shall be obliged at present to supersede them. In general however we may remark, that all human b grandeur is vanity; that Providence frequently makes use of some wicked men as its instruments in scourging of others, and consequently that villainy must be frequently triumphant; and lastly, that a strict attachment to the dictates of justice and humanity is not only laudable, but politic, in all states, how elevated soever, since a deviation from these cannot be secured by the most formidable and extensive power from a retaliation.

fea-forces.

Advice being brought to Carthage of the terrible fate that both the land and seanisns are in the forces of the republic had met with in Sicily, the whole city was overwhelmed with utmost conster-nation upon re- forrow. Every part of it was filled with outcries and lamentations, and the people ceiving the me- were under the same dismal apprehensions, as if the enemy had actually made them- c laucholy news selves masters of the town. All the houses in the city, as well as the temples, being thut up, an intire stop was put to every kind of business, and even to their religious their land and worship. This happened when the Carthaginians were seized with the first impressions of terror; for soon after, recovering themselves, they began to entertain hopes, that, upon the general's arrival, things might possibly turn out better than they had been represented. They did not however continue long in a state of suspense; for in a little time the poor remains of their shattered troops landed near Carthage, and confirmed the melancholy account they had before received. Upon this, all the wretched inhabitants abandoned themselves intirely to despair, and giving a full vent to their grief, made the shore ring with their groans and lamentations. In d short, a greater scene of horror, except the spot of ground where the Carthaginian army encamped before Syracuse, than Carthage now was, cannot well be conceived y.

Himilco. not being able to furvive his misfortunes, kills himfelf.

Himilco in the mean time, landing at Carthage, appeared in mean and fordid attire. He was immediately met by a vast concourse of people, bemoaning their sad and inauspicious fortune. Joining with these forlorn wretches, and listing up his hands to heaven, he bitterly bewailed his own hard fate, but most of all that of his country. Afterwards impiously taxing the gods with partiality, and making them the fole authors of his misfortune, he told his countrymen, they ought to esteem it as a fingular happiness, that their present calamitous condition was not brought upon them by their own ill conduct, and that the enemy could assume to themselves no e merit from it: "The enemy, said he, may indeed rejoice at our misery, but have "no reason to glory in it. The troops we have lost did not fall by their valour, " nor did they oblige those that are now arrived safe here to abandon their island We return victorious over the Syracusians, and are only defeated by " the plague. As for the baggage found in our camp, this ought not to be looked " upon as the spoils of a conquered enemy, but as moveables, which the casual " death of the owners has left the Syracufians in possession of. No part of the disaster, " continued he, touches me fo much, as my furviving fo many gallant men, and my being referved, not for the comforts of life, but to be the sport of so dire " a calamity. Since therefore I have brought back to Carthage the remaining part f " of the army under my conduct, I shall speedily follow those brave men, who or perished in Sicily, and thereby demonstrate to my country, that it was not out of " a fondness for life, but merely to preserve the troops, which had escaped the " plague, from the fury of the enemy, to which, by my more early death, they would have been exposed, that I survived them." After this, going directly to his house, and shutting the doors against the citizens, and even his own children, he gave himself the fatal stroke. This violent death Diodorus interprets as a signal punishment inflicted upon him, for his having so frequently violated the fanctity of a temples and tombs at Syracuse, which, according to our author, was a crime of a most flagrant and enormous nature 2.

THE fame of Dionysius's success being spread all over the Carthaginian dominions, and those of their consederates in Africa, the affairs of this state there were soon almost in as bad a situation as in Sicily. The Africans bore a natural hatred to the Carthaginians, and this was much heightened, when it came to be publicly known in Africa, that Himileo had faved only the citizens of Cartbage, leaving the confederates behind to the mercy of the enemy. Incensed therefore to the last degree, and revolt from the moved with a thorough contempt of the Carthaginians, who now were become despi- Carthaginians. cable to all their neighbours, the cities and states which had sent them auxiliaries, b took up arms, intending to take signal vengeance of them, for the late affront offered them in the persons of their countrymen. They dispatched expresses into all parts, notifying the ill usage they had met with in the most aggravating terms; by which means, supplies coming from every quarter, they soon assembled a considerable body of troops, with which they encamped in the fields. And now their defign being publicly known, and that they had forces likewise to put it in execution, the whole country rose; so that their army in a short time amounted to above two hundred thousand effective men. With this formidable body they immediately took their rout towards Carthage 3. On their march, they took Tunis, a city in the neighbourhood of Carthage, which They take Tuc furrendered at the first summons. This gave a dreadful alarm to the citizens of Car-nis, and adthage, who now gave up every thing for loft. However, upon the approach of the neighbourhood enemy, they engaged them; but were defeated in a pitched battle, and obliged to of Carthage. retire within their walls. As the Carthaginians, in all public calamities, carried their superstition to a very great excess, their first care was to appease the offended gods, particularly Ceres and Proserpina, whose temples they had violated at Syracuse, and therefore considered this fresh melancholy incident as the effect of their resentment. Before, these deities had never been heard of in Africa; but now, to atone for the outrage that had been offered them, magnificent statues were erected in their honour; priefts selected from amongst the most distinguished samilies of the city for their serd vice; and all their facrifices ordered to be offered after the Greek manner, those Greeks amongst them, who were versed in the rites and ceremonies peculiar to the worship of these goddesses, being appointed to officiate in this service. Having by this means sufficiently, as they apprehended, atoned for past offences to these deities, they equipped a fleet, and made all necessary preparations to reduce the rebels, and those who supported them, to reason b.

THOUGH the African forces were very numerous, yet, happily for the Carthagi- But are obliged mians, they wanted a general, as well as subordinate officers, of experience, and had at last to neither warlike engines to carry on a fiege, nor provisions to support so vast a multitude; whereas the Carthaginians, being masters of the sea, were supplied with every e thing in great plenty from Sardinia. Such an army as this was like a body uninformed with a foul. As there was no discipline or subordination in it, every person might fet up himself for a general, and claim an independence on the rest; which would soon cause numberless sactions and divisions amongst them, and consequently soon dissolve the whole. Thus in fact it happened with this rabble of an army; for diffensions arising therein, the famine daily increasing, and many of their leaders being bribed by the Carthaginians to defert, the individuals of it withdrew to their respeclive homes, and by this means delivered Carthage from one of the most imminent dangers that had ever threatened it c.

AFTER the late disafter in Sicily, Himilco had left Mago to take care of the Carthaf ginian interest there, and settle their broken assairs in the best manner possible. In order to this, he treated all the Sicilians Subject to Carthage with great mildness and humanity, and granted his protection to all those who were persecuted by Dionysius. He also entered into alliances with several Sicilian cities, which had an aversion to that tyrant. Strengthened by these alliances, and receiving great reinforcements from Carthage, he formed an army, and made an incursion into the territory of Messana. Having ravaged this in a dreadful manner, he carried off the plunder, Dionysius and retired to Abacanum, a city of his confederates, where he encamped. Dionystus, routs Mago at advancing to Abacanum with his army, offered him battle; which challenge Mago Abacanum.

JUSTIN. OROS. & DIOD. Sic. ubi fup. DIOD. Sic. ubi fup. b Idem ibid. e Idem ibid. c. 10. Vol. VI. No 10. 9 K accepted, accepted, but was driven out of the field, with the loss of above eight hundred men. a Upon this defeat, the Carthaginian general, with his broken troops, entered Abacanum; and Dionysius returned to Syracuse d.

NOTWITHSTANDING the great losses the Carthaginians had sustained in the course nians, not with- of this war, they could not forbear making new attempts upon the island of Sicily. standing their Their officers were therefore sent, as usual, to levy forces in Africa, Sardinia, and some losses, meditate a fresh attempt of those parts of Italy not inhabited by Greeks. As they had hitherto had such bad whom the island fuccess with their fleet, they proposed determining the fate of Sicily by a decisive battle in the field; for which reason they fitted out a much weaker squadron of long ships. than in any of the former expeditions. The Carthaginians armed all their troops on this occasion in the completest manner, and appointed Mago, who was defeated the b year before at Abacanum, commander in chief, hoping the face of affairs in the island above-mentioned would foon receive a very confiderable alteration.

Mago, affembling his land forces, found them to amount to eighty thousand fighting men, with which he landed in Sicily. On his march through the territories of the Siculi, many cities fell to him; which gave him great encouragement. At last he encamped on the river Chrysas in the country of the Agyrineans, and attempted to bring over that people to his party; but his endeavours proving ineffectual, and receiving intelligence, that Dionylius was advancing against him at the head of twenty thousand men, he thought proper to continue some time in his camp, and put himself Dionysius wins there into a posture to receive the enemy. In the mean time the tyrant, being arrived c Agyris, tyrant in the neighbourhood of the Carthaginian camp, sent to Agyris, prince of the Agyof the Agyrinæ-rinæans, to join him with all his forces, and supply his troops with some provisions. This tyrant was next to Dionysius in power of all others in the island, his city containing no less than twenty thousand inhabitants. His coffers at that time were full of treasure; for he had lately put to death some of his principal subjects, and confiscated their estates. Dionysius therefore making him a visit, with some of his particular friends, prevailed upon Agyris to come into his measures; in consequence of which he received a supply of provisions, and a strong reinforcement of troops. What induced Agyris to fall in so readily with the Syracusian tyrant's views, was the promise of a large extent of territory adjoining to his own, in case their arms were d interest ;

attended with fuccess in this war . In the mean time Mago, finding himself in an enemy's country, and reduced to great streights for want of provisions, began to be very uneasy. The Syracusians were for coming to a battle immediately with him; but this Dionysius opposed, telling them, they might ruin the enemy's whole army without striking a stroke, by starving them to a furrender. And indeed he had good reason for what he advanced; for the Agyrinaans, being well acquainted with all the passes and by-ways of the country, every day furprised the Carthaginian parties, and, after cutting them to pieces, intercepted all the provisions they were carrying to their camp. However, the Syracusians, being disgusted at Dionysius's refusal to comply with their motion, directly e quitted his camp. This threw the tyrant into a great consternation, and obliged him to manumit all the flaves, as he had done once before. Soon after, the Carthaginians, moved by the dreadful prospect of a famine, thought proper to send embassadors to him, to propose an accommodation. This being as necessary for Dionysius in his present circumstances as the Carthaginians, a peace was concluded to the satisfaction of both parties, without any further effusion of blood. The new treaty agreed in all particulars with the former; only by an additional article the city of Taurominium was given up to Dionysius, who driving from thence the Siculi, placed the choicest of his mercenaries in their room. As for Mago, as foon as the treaty was figned, he returned to Carthage, leaving his allies in Sicily to shift for themselves. Thus this f war ended, notwithstanding the terrible blow they received before Syracuse, very little to the disadvantage of the Carthaginians f.

And concludes a peace with Mago.

> FROM this time, for nine years, the Carthaginians enjoyed an uninterrupted repose, at least history is filent as to any military transactions they were concerned in during that interval. But, in the second year of the ninety-ninth olympiad, Dionysius, meditating a war against them, formed a project of putting his finances upon (A) such a > > d Diop. Sic, l. xiv.c. to. de Idem ibid. c. tt. f Idem ibid.

(A) Aristotle and Polyanus affirm, that Dionysius, likewise a large ship with a body of horse on board, with which making a descent, he plundered the in his expedition to Etruria, had a hundred galleys, as a footing, as might enable him to carry it on with a prospect of success. This, by the affiftance of that good fortune, which had always attended him through the different scenes of his life to that time, he easily put in execution. Having fitted out fixty galleys, under colour of clearing the seas of pyrates, he made a descent in Etru-Dionysius ria, and plundered a rich temple in the suburbs of Agylla, carrying away, besides plunders a rich the rich moveables and furniture, above a thousand talents in money. Five hundred temple in Etruria, talents more he raised by the sale of the spoils, and, with this money, set on foot a numerous army. He now wanted nothing but a plaufible pretence to break with the And breaks Carthaginians, for which he was not long at a loss. Observing, that the Carthagi- again with the nian subjects in Sicily were inclined to a revolt, he took as many of them under his Carthaginians, b protection as would accept of it, and entered into a league with them; the consequence of which was an admission of his troops into their cities. The Carthaginians, being apprifed of this, first remonstrated against such a proceeding, as a manifest infraction of the treaties then subsisting between them, by ministers sent to the tyrant for that purpose; but this not availing, they declared war against him s.

The people of Carthage, suspecting his design against their state, upon the first notice they received of his extraordinary preparations, had strengthened themselves by alliances with their neighbours, and taken all other necessary measures to secure themselves against the impending storm. Expecting to be attacked by the tyrant's whole power, they formed an army out of the flower of their citizens, which was c joined by a strong body of foreign mercenaries they had engaged in their service. To give a greater diversion to the tyrant, they divided their army into two bodies, one of which they fent to Italy, and the other to Sicily; and this obliged Dionysius likewise to divide his forces. The main army however was to act in Sicily, under the command of Mago, who, soon after his arrival, was attacked by Dionysius at a place called Cabala. The encounter was rude and bloody; but at last the Carthaginians And defeats were overthrown, and forced to fly to a neighbouring hill, that was indeed strong them at Cabala by its situation, but destitute of water. In the battle they had ten thousand men in Sicily. killed upon the spot, together with Mago their general, who behaved with great bravery and resolution, and five thousand taken prisoners. The Carthaginians, terd rified by this defeat, and finding themselves blocked up by Dionysius on the hill, where they were like to die of thirst, were forced to sue for a peace. Dionysius answered the embassadors they sent him with great haughtiness, that there was only one way left for them to make peace with him, and that was, forthwith to evacuate Sicily, and to defray all the expences of the war. These hard terms they pretended to comply with; but at the fame time representing, that it was not in their power to deliver temple of Leucothea, from whence carrying off feventy talents in money, besides other valuable effects, he immediately put to sea again. The same au-thors relate, that, upon his re-imbarquing, he was informed, that the soldiers and seamen had privately conveyed on board the fleet a thousand talents of filver; whereupon he issued out an order, before he landed in Sicily, requiring every person to bring to him half of his treasure, upon pain of death, promiling each of them the other half for his own use, in case of a compliance herewith. When the land-men and mariners brought him in their respective halves, he knew what riches remained still in their possession, and obliged them to refund those likewise(1). Ælian takes notice of this expedition, telling us (2), that Dionysius impiously carried off all the treasures of Apollo and Leucothes, and amongst other valuable moveables a filver table, placed near the statue of Apollo; and that the men who took it out of the temple, at the same time drank, or offered, to the god, the cup of the good Genius; which they did by way of joke or ridicule, that cup or health going round the company amongst the antients, after the conclusion of their meals, when the tables were taken away. We must not omit observing, that the learned Perizonius imagines Aristotle's text here to have been corrupted, and thinks it may be corrected by Elian, viz. by inferting Troi (nris a or Troi (nris r instead of Tuppinviav, and this in contradiction to the manuscripts. But we must beg leave to diffent from that great man in this particular; for that this very passage of Ælian is corrupted, he himself allows; nay, so corrupted, that it has embaraffed most, if not all, of those learned men, who have endeavoured to translate and explain that author, particularly Gefner, Scheffer, and Justus Vulteins, none of whom have been able to come at his meaning. Besides, all the manuscripts of Polyanus, an author who did not occur to Perizonius, and who lived within a very few years of Elian, if he was not cotemporary with him, in the passage referred to, which was most certainly taken from Aristotle, have Tuppnviar. This authority is of much greater weight than the testimony of Panjanins, in proof of there having been in antient times a temple facred to Apollo at Trazene; which, we cannot help thinking, is little, if any thing at all, to the purpose.

* Diop. Sic. l. xv. c. 2.

1 2

<sup>(1)</sup> Ariflot. acconom. l. ii. Polyan. firat. l. v. c. 2. ex. 21. (2) Alian, var. hift. l. i. c. 20. 6 Jac. Perizon. com. in loc. Vide & Athen. in deipnosoph. l. xv. sub fin.

But is overthrown at

Cronion.

they obtained a truce, which was to last till the return of an express sent to Carthage. In the mean time they buried Mago, who, at the time of his death, was one of their suffectes, with as much pomp and magnificence, as the present melancholy situation of their affairs would permit, and appointed his son Mago to command the troops in his room h.

Dionysius, much elated with his good success, now looked upon himself as sovereign of all Sicily, not doubting but he should foon be in a capacity of giving laws to all his neighbours. But in this he was greatly mistaken; for the Carthaginians intended nothing less than in reality to accept of the conditions offered them. As their whole conduct on this occasion was calculated only to amuse the tyrant, till they had an b opportunity of re-establishing their affairs, in the time of the truce Mago their new general railed and disciplined fresh troops, and improved that short interval allowed him so well, that, at the return of the express sent to Carthage, he took the field with a powerful army. As Mago, though young, had, on many occasions, given proofs of an extraordinary valour and prudence, the forces under his conduct shewed great impatience to come to blows with the enemy. Observing therefore their ardour, immediately upon the expiration of the truce, he gave Dionysius battle not far from Cronion, and intirely defeated him (C), killing fourteen thousand Syracusians on the spot, and among the rest Leptines (D), his brother, a gallant officer, who was greatly regretted, even by those who hated the tyrant. In the beginning of the c engagement, Dionysius had the advantage, repulsing those that charged him with great bravery; but when he heard of the death of Leptines, and that the body he commanded was broken and dispersed, he immediately betook himself to slight, and was hotly purfued by the Carthaginians. A dreadful flaughter was made of the runaways in the pursuit; and as the enemy gave no quarter, the rest must all have been cut off to a man, had they not, by the favour of the night, found means to escape. This made the Carthaginians ample amends for the blow they received at Cabala, and left them in full possession, not only of their own towns, but also of a good part of the Syracusian territories. Dionysius, with the remains of his shattered army, fled to Syracuse, where he expected soon to be besieged by the victorious enemy. d But the Carthaginian general used his victory with great moderation, and, instead of pursuing the routed enemy, retired to Panormus, whence he sent embassadors to Dionysius, offering him terms of peace, which he readily embraced; and a treaty was concluded on the following conditions, viz. that both parties should keep what they had at the breaking out of the war, fave only that Dionysius should deliver up to the Carthaginians the city and territory of Selinus, and that part of the territory of Agrigentum adjoining to it, which extended as far as the river Halyeus, and besides pay a thousand talents, to defray the expences of the war. In other respects, all former treaties betwixt the two powers were to subsist in their sullest extent.

The Carthaginians make an expedition to Italy, in favour of the people of Hippo, who are their confederates:

The Carthaginians make an army in Italy, and restored the inhabitants of Hippo, or, as Strabo calls it, Hipponium, expedition to their city, from whence they had for some time been expelled. This city was very h Idem ibid. & Polyen. ftrat. l. vi. c. 16. ex. 1. Idem ibid.

(B) Polyanus relates this in a manner something different from Dindorus. He says, that the Carthaginians pretended they had not the power of concluding a peace with Dionysius, without the confent of their admiral; and therefore begged they might be permitted to remove their camp into the neighbourhood of their fleet, which would enable them to comply with the conditions prescribed them. The tyrant granted this request, though against the advice of Leptines; which brought upon him the disaster here mentioned (3).

(C) According to Polyanus, the Carthaginiums had a strong party in the city of Cronion, who were desirous of opening the gates to them. The Carthaginian general, being apprised of this, when the wind savoured his project, set a wood on fire, which grew close by the town, the smook of which being driven by the wind into the face of the enemy, who lay encamped over-against him, prevented them from discovering any motion he might make. Taking advantage of this, he approached the place, and was admitted by the Cronians in his interest into the town (4).

(D) Frontinus relates, that this Leptines was the author of the following stratagem: he ordered a detachment of his troops to lay waste his own lands, and burn several Syracusan castles and villages in the neighbourhood of the Carthaginian camp in the night-time. The Carthaginian, imagining this to have been done by their own men, sent a strong body of troops out of the camp to support them; but these failing into an ambuscade, which Leptines had laid for them, were intirely deseated, and driven back to their camp with great slaughter (5).

(3) Polyan. strat. l. vi. c. 16. ex. 1. l. ii. c. 5. ex. 11. (4) Idem, l. v.'c. 10. ex. 5.

(5) Sex. Jul. Frontin. strat.

a antient, as being mentioned by Scylax, and was, according to Strabo, built by the people of Locri. The Romans called it Vibo, Valentia, and Vibo Valentia; but Ptolemy made use of the old name, following herein Scylax and Strabo. If the last author may be credited, the country about it was extremely beautiful, being covered with flowers of various kinds, of which the matrons of the place made chaplets or garlands, and wore them in honour of Proserpina, who, according to an antient tradition prevailing amongst the natives, came thither on purpose to gather flowers. The citizens were undoubtedly in alliance with the Carthaginians, who made this expedition purely with a defign to reinstate them in the possession of their native country; which after they had effected, by recalling the exiles from all parts, and treating b them with great kindness, they returned to Africa.

IMMEDIATELY after the arrival of the troops from Italy, Carthage had a most terrible calamity to struggle with: the plague broke out afresh there, and swept away an infinite number of the inhabitants. This feems to have raged with greater violence than any diffemper the city was ever visited with before; for such vast multitudes were carried off by it, that the whole country was in a manner depopulated. The Africans and Sardi, encouraged by the extreme weakness to which that state The Africans was hereby reduced, attempted to shake off the Carthaginian yoke; but were at and Sirdi relast, not without some essusion of blood, reduced to their obedience. The pestilence bel; but are a we are now speaking of, was of a very singular nature; for panic terrors, and vio-their former e lent fits of frensy, seized on a sudden the heads of those afflicted with it, who fally- obedience. ing fword in hand out of their houses, as if the enemy had taken the city, killed or wounded all who unhappily came in their way. Justin seems to intimate, that the Carthaginians laboured under such a grievous sickness as this several years, with little or no intermission; for it appears from a hint he has given us, that they were delivered from the plague not long before the death of Dionyfius k.

Towards the beginning of the hundred and third olympiad, Dionysius, assembling a great number of forces, refolved to fall upon the Carthaginian, who were then in a very bad fituation, on account of the ravages the plague had made, and the war with the Africans and Sardi, which had not been long finished. As he had not d the least colour or pretext for such an open violation of treaties, he was obliged to have recourse to a downright falsity, viz. that the Carthaginians made incursione into his dominions. Without putting himself to the trouble therefore of making a formal declaration of war, he advanced into the Carthaginian territories, with an army of thirty thousand foot, and three thousand horse, attended by a navy of three hundred With this formidable force he foon reduced the cities of Selinus and Entella, plundering and laying waste all the adjacent country. Then he made himself master Dionysius of Eryx, and laid fiege to Lilybaum; which, being defended by a numerous garri-takes Eigx son, baffled his efforts in such a manner, that he was obliged to rise from before it. from the Car-Being informed, that the arsenal at Carthage was consumed by fire, he concluded, thaginians; but that this state would find it impossible to equip a fleet, and therefore laid up thirty of fleet surprised. his best galleys in the haven at Eryx, and sent back all the rest to Syracuse. The by them in the Carthaginians, being apprifed how little the tyrant was upon his guard, immediately for of that manned two hundred galleys, and unexpectedly entering the port of Eryx, surprised elly. that part of his fleet laid up there, and carried most of it off. After this, a truce was agreed upon by both parties, and the troops retired into winter-quarters. Dionyfius did not long furvive this event: having reigned thirty-eight years, he was fucceeded by a fon of the same name in the government of Syracuse 1.

THOUGH Diodorus does not say express, that the Carthaginians, upon the last The Greek lanrupture, sent a body of troops to Sicily, yet Justin gives us some reason to believe, suage is expelrupture, sent a body of troops to Sicily, yet Justin gives us some reason to believe, suage is expelled Carthage, f that they either did, or designed it, and that the commander's name was Hanno. on account of a The same author farther informs us, that Suniator, or Suniates, a person of great treasonable corauthority in the city, bore an implacable hatred to Hanno, and, in order to do him respondence a prejudice, endeavoured to give the enemy intelligence of his motions. This he carried on in it did by writing in Greek to Dionysius; but his letter, wherein he made very free with thaginian and Hanno's character, was intercepted, and he thereupon found guilty of treason by the Dionysius. fenate. This occasioned the passing of a law at Carthage, whereby all the inhabit-

n. 1. & p. 150. n. 7. Cic. pro Planc. c. 40. & ad Attic. iii. ep. 3. Plin. l. iii. c. 5. 1 Diod. Sic. l. xv. c. 8.

Ú

7

يزز

the

5 (0

tong 1¢71

1

ants were forbid learning either to write or speak the Greek language, that they might a be deprived of all means of corresponding with the enemy m.

Orofius miftaken.

We are told by Orofius, that the Carthaginians concluded their first treaty with the Romans in the four hundred and second year of Rome, which was not far from the time we are now speaking of. But this we must by no means give credit to, because it is contradicted by Polybius, an author infinitely superior in point of authority to Orofius, who affirms, that the first treaty the Carthaginians entered into with the Romans happened in the year after the regifuge; and that this was the fecond. And here we cannot forbear expressing our surprize at M. Rollin, who quotes Orosius as affirming this to have been the fecond treaty concluded between the two republics; whereas that author expresly afferts it to have been the first. The articles of this b treaty may be seen in a former part of this work, and therefore we shall not here repeat them. However, it may be proper to observe, that the people of Utica and Tyre, according to Polybius, were comprised in the treaty, and that the Romans were not permitted to build towns, or ravage the country, in any part beyond the Fair Promontory, Mastia, and Tarseium. The Carthaginians, being at this time in full possession of Sardinia, and a great part of Africa, thought it consistent with justice, and even policy, to prevent all intercourse betwixt the Romans and these countries. From the treaty here mentioned it farther appears, that both the Romans and Carthaginians applied themselves with great diligence at this time to commerce. Soon after this event, the Romans gained a fignal victory over the Samnites; upon which the c Carthaginians fent to compliment the republic on her success, and made a present of a crown (E) of gold of twenty-five pounds weight to Jupiter Capitelinus, by way of thanksgiving for so glorious an action ". But to return to the affairs of Sicily,

Dionyfius the lecond comes to an accommodation with the Carthagi-

THE prince now upon the throne was of quite a different character from his father. being as peaceable and calm in his temper, as the other was active and enterprising; but this mildness and moderation being rather the effect of a slothful and indolent disposition, than of a wise and judicious understanding, his subjects from hence reaped no great benefit. Soon after his taking upon himself the government of Syracuse, he changed the truce with the Carthaginians into a perpetual peace, and made it his endeavour to cultivate a good understanding with that neighbouring state. As Dio- d dorus ascribes this peace to his indolence and sloth, and consequently, in some meafure, feems to upbraid him for it, we have fome reason from hence to believe, that the terms of it were not very advantageous to the Syracusians.

A war com-Dionytius and the Carthaginians on the other.

Some years after, the people of Syracule, being agitated by civil dissensions, were mences between involved in the greatest miseries (F). Dionysius was obliged to quit his throne, and and the Corin- continued an exile for ten years; but at last, the city being rent into parties and thians on the factions upon the death of Dion, he found means to reinstate himself in his dominions. one hand, and His past missortunes greatly inflamed his temper, and rendered him very savage and brutal. In short, the better fort of the citizens, not being able to brook so cruel a servitude, implored the aid of Icetas, who was by descent a Syracusian, and at that time tyrant of the Leontini; they created him general of all their forces, abandoning themselves to his conduct; not that they had any great opinion of his virtue, but

"Justin. ubi fup. l. iii. c. 5. Mel. l. ii. c. 4. Liv. l. xxxv. c. 40, &c. "Oros. l. i. ad A. U. C. cdi. M. Rollin in hist. anc. des Carthag. p. 223. à Amsterdam, 1733. Polyb. l. iii. c. 22, 23, 24. Liv. l. vii. Univers. hist. vol. iv. p. 595. Odod. Sic. l. xvi. c. 2.

(E) This must have been a mere compliment, proceeding from some political motive to us unknown; for it was by no means the interest of the Carthaginians, that the Samnites should be subdued by the Romans. The latter, at this time, began to rival the Carthaginians in trade; whereas the former feem to have been their good and faithful allies; at least it is certain they sometimes supplied them with bodies of auxiliary or mercenary troops, as we shall find towards the close of this section. This passing seems to intimate, that fupiter was a deity well known at Carthage, and that his image there was adorned with a crown of gold, agreeably to what has been before observed of Baal in the Phænician history (6).

(F) It appears from Diodorus, that the Carthaginians were at the bottom of these civil dissensions at Syracuse; for Dionysius had never been dethroned by Dion, had not Paralus, the Carthaginian governor of Minos, a city in the territory of Agrigentum, supposed to have been built by Minos, given the latter a kind reception there, permitted him to land five thousand arms, and supplied him with carriages to convey them to Syracuse. This was certainly good policy in the Carthaginians, whose in-terest it was to endeavour rending the city of Syracule into as many factions as possible, that the inhabitants might destroy one another, and thereby become a more easy prey to the state of Carthage (7).

a because they had no other resource. Besides, they entertained some hopes of his being both able and willing to protect them, as he was in some respect their countryman, and had an army able to cope with that of Dionysius. The Carthaginians, thinking this a proper opportunity to make themselves absolute masters of Sicily, fitted out a great fleet, and for some time hovered about the coasts of that island, not being at first determined where to make a descent. This so alarmed the Syracusians, that they apprehended themselves upon the brink of ruin, and in this extremity resolved to have recourse to the Corinthians, from whom they were originally descended, and whose assistance had several times extricated them out of great difficulties. The Corinthians, being the most samed of all the Greek nations for their professed aversion to tyranny in every shape, readily granted their request, and gave their embassadors a b most kind reception. Icetas, whose only view was to make himself master of Syraeuse, in the mean time seemed to concur with these measures, though he had actually entered into an alliance with the Carthaginians. He was in hopes fome domestic broils or other would prevent the Corinthians from affifting their relations, and then; by his complying with this motion, he doubted not he should win over to his interest those very persons who made it, which would enable him the more easily to accomplish his design. He therefore dispatched deputies himself along with the Syracusian ministers; but in the mean time was contriving how he could prevent the Corintbians from fending any forces into the island, which, according to his last treaty with the Carthaginians, was, after the expulsion of Dionysius, to be divided between him and c them. However, the Corinthians, then enjoying a profound tranquillity, were at leifure to fend a body of troops to Syracuse, which, in a general assembly, it was refolved should be done. As the Syracusians in particular defired they would send them an able and experienced general, they appointed Timoleon, the fon of Timodemus and Demariste, a person of distinguished merit, to take upon him the command of the Syracufian army, in conjunction with their forces, and with these he was to act against Dionysius and the Carthaginians P.

THE Syracusian embassadors were scarce set out for Corinth, when Icetas took off Icetas endeathe mask, and openly joined the Carthaginians, intending, by their assistance, to fuade the Copostess himself of Syracuse, and that under colour of assisting the inhabitants against rinthians from d Dionysius. But being apprehensive, that a body of forces from Corinth, under the sending any conduct of a skilful general, would defeat his measures, he dispatched an express to forces to Syrathe Corintbians, acquainting them, that the Carthaginians, apprifed of their defign, cufe. were waiting to intercept their squadron with a strong sleet; and that their slowness in fending him fuccours had obliged him to call in even the Carthaginians to his aid, and employ them against the tyrant; wherefore they might forbear making any further levies, or exhausting their treasures by great, but useles expences, since he could, with the affistance of his allies the Carthaginians, drive out Dionysius, and restore Syracuse to its antient liberty. The Corintbians, hereby plainly discovering, that the tyrant aspired to the sovereignty of Syracuse, and being justly at that time celee brated for the generous notions they entertained in behalf of liberty, were incenfed to the last degree at such a persidious conduct; and therefore those who had before either opposed the expedition, or been cold and languid in promoting it, now readily concurred with the rest, and all the necessary dispositions were made for Timoleon's sudden departure 9.

ははは田田田田

ιþr

11.0

Plutarch tells us, that when the troops were ready to embarque, the goddess Pro-Timoleon, enferpina, attended by her mother Ceres, both in travelling habits, appeared to her couraged by sefemale priests in a dream or vision; and that both these deities declared they would veral good fail with Timoleon to Sicily, an island in a peculiar manner facred to them. This greatly omens, sets fail fail with Timoleon to Sicily, an island in a peculiar manner facred to them. This greatly for Sicily. encouraged Timoleon, who, confecrating the best trireme of his squadron to the goddesses, f called it the facred ship of Ceres and Proferpina. The same author likewise relates, that Timoleon going to Delphi, in order to facrifice there to Apollo, and descending into the place where the responses of the oracle were received, a wreath or garland, interwoven with crowns and trophies, flipping from among the confecrated gifts, that were hung up in the temple, fell directly upon his head; which he interpreted as a happy omen, Afollo thereby feeming to crown him with success, and to assure him of a triumph over Icetas and the Carthaginians. He fet fail from Corinth with feven galleys of his own nation, two of Corcyra, and a tenth, which was fent him by the Leucadians, with only a thousand soldiers on board; a very small force, considering a the enterprize he was going upon. Our author farther informs us, that Timoleon, getting out of port by night, was carried by a prosperous gale into the ocean, and preceded in the night by a flame, resembling those torches that were used in the facred mysteries of Ceres and Proserpina, which conducted him to that part of Italy where he intended to land; and that this being interpreted by his foothfayers as a confirmation of what those two goddesses had before declared, he looked upon it as a fure token of victory. Pursuing his voyage therefore over the Ionian sea with great alacrity, he foon arrived fafe with his small fleet at Metapontum, now Torre di Mare, on the coast of Italy r.

Upon his arri. of Italy, he amuses lectas and the Car. thaginians.

THE first advice he received here was, that Icetas had defeated Dionysius, and b val on the coast having made himself master of the greatest part of the city, had obliged the tyrant to shut himself up in the citadel. At the same time he was informed, that the Carthaginians had, by the treaty with Icetas, engaged themselves to hinder the Corinthian squadron from putting in at any of the Sicilian ports, that being by this means obliged to return home, they might from thence meet with no farther obstruction in dividing the island between them. This gave him great uneafiness; however, he advanced with his small fleet to Rhegium, where he found embassadors from Icelas, who were charged to acquaint him, that, if he thought proper, he might come to Syracuse, and affist him with his advice; and that he should meet with a kind reception there, and even be a partaker of his good fortune, provided he would difmis c his troops; but otherwise the Syracusians, who were jealous of foreign forces, would not admit him into the city. These ministers were convoyed to Rhegium by twenty Carthaginian galleys, who had orders to block up the road, and oppose Timoleon, if he offered to approach Syracuse. That general, finding himself unable to force his way, by reason of the superior strength of the enemy, and that, even provided he could land at Syracuse, his handful of troops would not be able to engage those of Icetas, flushed with victory, and supported by a numerous Carthaginian army, was resolved to have recourse to artifice at this critical conjuncture. He therefore demanded a conference with the embaffadors, and the chief commanders of the Carthaginian squadron, in the presence of the people of Rhegium. He presented to listen to the d proposal offered him; but insisted, that as the Rhegians were Greeks, and common friends to both parties, he ought first to hear what they had to say, and act, if possible, by their advice, that he might, on his return to Corinth, have wherewithal to justify his conduct; alledging further, that the Carthaginians themselves would more scrupuloufly observe the articles of a treaty they had figned before so many witnesses. The Rhegians were privy to the delign, and dreaded nothing more than the confequence of having so formidable a nation in their neighbourhood as the Carthaginians. They summoned therefore an assembly, and shut the gates of the city, under pretence of preventing the citizens from going abroad, that they might apply themfelves folely to the affair in hand. In the mean time the Carthaginians, being amused, e and verily believing, that Timoleon would be persuaded to return home, had not made the least preparation to attack him, in case he should attempt steering his course towards the coast of Sicily.

And lands his Ly a stratagem.

Timoleon, that he might not give the Carthaginians the least room to suspect his forces in Sicily delign, did not offer for a confiderable time to stir out of the assembly, which being met, long speeches were made, and debates carried on, in appearance with great warmth, though without coming to a point, on purpose to gain time; nay, Timoleon, farther to prevent any ground for suspicion, frequently made signs, as though he was going to begin a speech in support of the resolution he had seemingly formed. But while the Carthaginian commanders were bufy in the council, nine f Corintbian galleys, according to the orders they had received from Timoleon, fet fail, and passed in sight of the Carthaginian sleet, unable at that time to act, by reason of the absence of its captains, and moreover believing, that their departure had been agreed on between the officers of both parties, who, it was supposed, were then in the city. When Timoleon was privately informed, that his galleys were at fea, by the affistance of the Rhegians about his chair, he slipped through the crowd, and making to the galley that was left, embarqued, and rejoined the rest of his squadron. The Carthaginians, being thus deluded, were extremely chagrined, making bitter coma plaints of the Rhegian perfidiousness and fraud. The Rhegians, on the other hand, greatly rejoiced to see the Carthaginians overcome at their own weapons, and could not forbear rallying them thereupon. The affembly not having broken up till it was dark, the Carthaginians could not come up with Timoleon, so far was he got before them, though they gave him chace for some time. He arrived therefore sate with his whole fleet at Taurominium s.

THE Carthaginian general, apprifed of Timoleon's landing at Taurominium, di- The Carthagi spatched an express on board one of his galleys thither, threatening Andromachus, nians threaten tyrant of that city, with his resentment, if he did not immediately drive away the with their re Corintbians from thence. The form of the menace, according to Plutarch, was this: sentment, if he b The barbarian, stretching out his hand with the inside upward, and then turning it continued to down again, threatened to turn the city topfy-turvy just so, in as little time, and harbour Tiwith as much ease. Andromachus, laughing, made no other reply to this insolence, than by repeating the same motion with an air of contempt, and ordering him to be gone immediately, upon pain of having that trial of dexterity exercised first upon the vessel which brought him thither. This single circumstance, slight as it is, seems clearly to point out the Carthaginian original, such kind of insolent denunciations having been common in the east, as may be learned from scripture, to omit what may be collected on this head from profane authors.

Icetas no sooner received intelligence of Timoleon's arrival in Sicily, than he was Timoleon dec thrown into a great consternation, and defired the Carthaginians to send a squadron feats Icetas as of galleys with all possible expedition to guard the coasts. Soon after, he put the Adranum. Carthaginian fleet, confifting of an hundred and fifty galleys, in possession of the harbour of Syracuse, and dispatched an express to Mago, the Carthaginian general, pressing him to advance with his whole army to the gates of the city. In the mean time Timoleon, drawing his forces out of Taurominium, which in the whole did not amount to above a thousand or twelve hundred men, began his march towards the dusk of the evening, and arrived the next day at Adranum, a place to which Icetas had advanced a little before at the head of a Carthaginian detachment of five thousand These he surprised at supper, and therefore meeting with but a faint resistd ance, easily made himself master of their camp, putting three hundred of them to the sword, and taking six hundred prisoners. In order to follow his blow, and Arike the greater terror into the enemy, he flew like lightning to Syracuse, and even broke into one part of the town, before any thing of his march was known. Here he immediately took post with his troops, and defended himself with that intrepid resolution, that the whole united power of Icetas and the Carthaginians found it imposfible to diflodge him ".

THE Carthaginians, being informed, some time before this war broke out, that The situation the whole island of Sicily was soon like to be in a slame, greatly caressed all those of affairs in sities with whom they were in alliance to which many other neighbouring states Sicily, when cities with whom they were in alliance, to which many other neighbouring states Timoleon e were invited to accede, particularly Icetas, tyrant of the Leontini, the Syracufian broke into Sygeneral, with whom a treaty offensive and defensive was concluded, as above-men-racuse. tioned. In order therefore to make good their engagements, and support their confederates, especially Icetas, they raised a great number of forces both by sea and land, and transported them to Sicily, under the command of Hanno their general. Upon a general muster here, the army was found to consist of fifty thousand men, and three hundred chariots. These were attended with two thousand carriages drawn by two horses a-piece, an immense quantity of provisions, besides a prodigious number of arms, engines of battery, and all forts of warlike stores. The sleet, destined to concur with these land-forces in the operations of the campaign, was composed of f an hundred and fifty long ships or galleys, as related above. Hanno, with his forces, moved first towards Entella; which city he caused to be blocked up, having before ravaged and destroyed the country all round it. The Campanians however, then in garrison, found means to notify their distress to the neighbouring cities, and to defire their affistance; but none of them durst stir, except Galeria, which fent them a reinforcement of a thousand men, who, being intercepted by the Carthaginians, were all cut to pieces. The Campanians indeed, who inhabited Ætna, seemed at first, on account of their confanguinity, disposed to assist them; but receiving advice of the terrible fate the Galerians had met with, they judged it more convenient to lie still. In the

PLUT. & DIODOR. ibid.

* 1 King. xx. 10. & alib. paff.

" PLUT. & DIODOR. ubi sup.

g Qi

άII

id

the

Mg

[;:

(I)

13

mean time Icetas, moving from Leontium with his army, encamped at Olympus, for- a tifying his camp with a trench and a parapet, that he might be the better enabled to receive Dionysius, in case he should think proper to attack him. Provisions failing him, he was obliged to return to Leontium for a fresh supply. This Dionysius interpreting as a flight, fell directly upon his rear; which brought on a general engagement. But, after a sharp conslict, Icelas routed him, killing three thousand of his men upon the spot, and pursuing the rest with so much ardour, that he entered with them pell-mell into the town of Syracuse; by which means he possessed himself of the whole city, except the island on which the citadel stood. This was the situation of affairs in Syracuse, when Timoleon broke into the city, and gave Icetas the deseat above-mentioned w.

The Sicilians at

BEFORE the action at Adranum, the Sicilians in general were so far from being first not disposed disposed to join Timoleon, that they were prejudiced against him as a foreign commander; which was chiefly owing to the calamities they had formerly suffered by the treachery of Calippus an Albenian, and Pharax a Lacedæmonian general; for these persons, under the specious pretext of delivering them from tyranny, had treated them in a more rigorous and oppressive manner than the worst and most despotic of their own tyrants. The people of Adranum only were divided in their fentiments, fome preferring the Carthaginians and Icetas, and others the Corintbians. Hence it came to pass, that both parties were folicited for succours by their respective confederates; and both fides accordingly advancing to the relief of their friends much c about the fame time, engaged in the manner above related. The Corinthians, being victorious, intirely through the valour and conduct of Timoleon, according to Plutarch, were received with open arms by the people of Adranum, and, after their example, other cities opened their gates to Timoleon, and joined him with all their forces. In the mean time Dionysius, as we have already observed, possessed the island of Ortygia, Icetas Neapolis and Acradina, Timoleon all the rest of the city, and the Carthaginians the port, having moreover their army encamped at a small distance from the town. This deplorable fituation threw Timoleon into great perplexities, so that he was at a loss what course to take. Whilst he remained in a state of suspense, he was reinforced by a body of the Adranita and Tynderita; Marcus or Mamercus d also, prince of Catana, an able warrior, and master of an immense treasure, advanced at the head of a powerful army to his relief. Upon such an unexpected flow of success, many forts and castles surrendered to him; and lastly, to crown all, he received advice, that the Corinthians had fent him a farther supply of soldiers on board ten galleys, which were happily arrived at Thurium, together with money to pay all their troops at Syracuse x.

Dionylius furrenders the Dionysius, seeing himself besieged on all sides, without any hopes of relief, sent prirenders the vately embassadors to Timoleon, offering to put the citadel, which he could no longer cuse to Timo. defend, into his hands, upon condition he would suffer him to retire unmolested. Timoleon, immediately closing with so advantageous an offer, readily agreed to what the e tyrant defired, and detached Euclid and Telemachus, two Corinthian officers, with four hundred men, to take possession of that important place. As the Carthaginians had a strong guard upon the haven, and consequently were masters of that part of the town adjoining to it, where Icetas was posted, the Corinthians could not march in a body to the citadel, and therefore they entered it in small parties. Dionysius received them within the walls, and delivered up to them not only all his warlike stores and provifions, but even the rich moveables of his palace, with a vast number of horses, darts, military engines, all the old magazine, containing feventy thousand complete suits of armour, and two thousand regular troops, which Timoleon incorporated among his own. After this, Dionysius was fent to Corinth by Timoleon in a single galley, with- f out any convoy, where he arrived fafe, notwithstanding the Carthaginians, being apprised of his departure, had laid several vessels in wait for him. The Carthaginians were so disheartened at these missortunes, coming as it were one upon the neck of another, (for Plutarch tells us they happened all in the space of fifty days) that they did not offer to make the least movement, either with their fleet or land-forces, tho' the latter were above ten times as numerous as the Corintbians y.

According to Diodorus, the first treaty between the Romans and Carthaginians was figned this year, which was the first of the hundred and ninth olympiad. As a this corresponded with the four hundred and fourth or four hundred and fifth year of Rome, (if, with Fabius Pictor, we place the foundation of that city in the first year of the eighth olympiad) it is not improbable, that Orofius, in the passage abovecited, followed Diodorus Siculus. But neither of them, in the point before us, deserves any consideration; for the we do not pretend to deny, that there might have been a treaty concluded this year between the two republics aforefaid, yet, that it was the first, we can by no means allow; fince Polybius, who undoubtedly consulted both the Roman and Carthaginian archives, does not only affure us, that they entered into a treaty above an hundred and fixty years before this time, but likewife gives us the express words of that treaty. His authority therefore, in this case, as well as in b all others relating to the Roman and Carthaginian affairs, as interwoven, must be looked upon as incontestable 2.

But to return to the Carthaginian transactions in Sicily: Towards the conclusion of The Corinthis, and the beginning of the following year, the Carthaginian forces, that were to thian garrifon in the citadel act in favour of Icctas, received a strong reinforcement, and Mago was appointed to defends itself command them. Upon the retreat of Dionysius, Icetas laid siege to the citadel of against the Syracuse, which was desended only by sour hundred Corinthians, left there by Timoleon, united sorces of under the conduct of one Leon, an experienced and brave officer. Timoleon, who Carthaginians. had withdrawn to Catana, fent the garrifon frequent supplies of provisions; but they were for the most part intercepted by Icetas, who kept the place closely blocked up c on all fides. When they were reduced to the last extremity, Timoleon found means to relieve them, by conveying into the place, in spite of all opposition, a great quantity of corn. This he did by the affistance of small fisher-boats and skiffs, which got a passage through the Carthaginian sleet in the most tempestuous weather, sliding over the waves and billows up to the citadel, when the enemy's galleys were either beat one against another, or dispersed by the violence of the wind. Whilst these things happened, Icetas formed a defign to affaffinate Timoleon at Adranum, to which place he had for a fhort time retired, and employed two foreigners, probably Carthaginians, for that purpose; but they were prevented from executing their execrable design in a very providential manner, a full and minute account of which remarkd able event may be seen in Plutarch. Timoleon, after his escape, returned to Catana, and continued supplying his troops in the citadel with provisions, as often as an opportunity offered. The besieged were however greatly satigued, by being obliged to be continually under arms, in order to repel the enemy's assaults, which were frequent and vigorous, and to repair the breaches made by their battering engines. Nevertheless they defended themselves with incredible bravery, and, having their renowned general himself so near at hand, despised all the efforts of the enemy a. Icetas, being much chagrined at his late difappointment, and finding his foldiers Icetas introdesert in great numbers to the enemy, dispatched an express to Mago, the Carthagi-duces the Carnian general, desiring him to advance with his troops to the gates of the city. As armyinto Syrae soon as he arrived, Icetas, without any scruple, admitted him at the head of the whole cuse. Punic army, confisting of fixty thousand men, into the town; which was a point the Carthaginians, in all their struggles with the Siculo-Greeks, could never gain before. As Mago's fleet of an hundred and fifty sail at the same time rode in the harbour, the city feemed to be intirely in the enemy's hands. Timoleon, being informed of this, kept his troops together, but for the present remained at Catana, that he might be at hand to encourage and fuccour the Corintbian troops in the citadel; which he did so effectually, by continuing to supply them with corn and other provisions, in the manner above related, as well as by giving them hopes of obliging the enemy to raise the siege, that they were not under the least apprehension for the safety of the place 5.

Mago and Icetas, finding it impossible to reduce the citadel, as long as Timoleon The Corinthian was in that neighbourhood, resolved to leave part of the army in Syracuse, and with garrison in the the rest either drive Timoleon from Catana, or block him up in that city. Tho' they sally take knew his forces were very inconsiderable in comparison of those with which they Acradina. intended to attack him, yet, having a great opinion of the abilities of that general, they picked out the very flower of their troops on this occasion. They were scarce gone, when Leon, who commanded in the citadel, observing, that those who were left to continue the fiege were very remiss in their duty, made a sudden sally, killed a great number of them, put the rest to slight, and having possessed himself of the a quarter of the city called Acradina, fortified it, and, by works of communication, joined it to the citadel. As Acradina was the best and most opulent part of Syracuje, confisting, as it were, of several towns united, Leon found vast sums of ready money, and great plenty of provisions, in it; which, at that time, were of fignal service to him. A courier was immediately fent away with this melancholy news to Mago and Icetas, who, upon receiving it, returned in great hafte to Syracuse, though they were then but a small distance from Catana; but could not, upon their arrival, dislodge the enemy from the post they had gained. In the mean time a supply of two surply of troops thousand foot and two hundred horse from Corinth landed safe in Sicily, having been from Corinth; detained a confiderable time at Thurium by tempestuous weather, and found means b to elude the vigilance of the Carthaginian squadron under Hanno, posted to intercept That commander, not imagining the Corinthians would attempt a paffage to Sicily in such a stormy season, lest his station at Thurium, and, ordering his seamen to crown themselves with garlands, and adorn their vessels with bucklers of both the Greek and Carthaginian form, failed to Syracuse in a triumphant manner, where he gave the troops in the citadel to understand, that he had taken the succours Timoleon expected, thinking by this means to intimidate them to a surrender. But whilst he spent his time in such trisling amusements, the Corintbians marched with great expedition through the territories of the Brutii to Rhegium, and taking the advantage of a gentle breeze, were easily wasted over to Sicily. This capital error in Hanno e proved the total ruin of Icetas, and, in its consequences, was of infinite prejudice to the Carthaginians c.

1

&lt;sup>2</sup> Dior. Sic. ubi sup. Oros. l. iv. Polyb. l. iii. p. 245, 246, &c. edit. Gronov. b Idem ibid.

And reduces Mcsana.

Timoleon, greatly animated by this new reinforcement, marched against Messana, which he foon made himself master of, and then advanced in good order to Syracuse. Mago was feized with a panic upon the news of his approach, infomuch that he feemed only to want a pretence to quit the island, tho' the new Corintbian succours, in conjunction with all Timoleon's other troops, did not form a corps of above four thousand men. Soon after, some of Icetas and Timoleon's Greek mercenaries mixing together in conversation, whilst they were fishing for eels in the marshes about Syracuje, one of the Corinthian party addressed himself to those of the other side in the d following terms: " Is it possible for Greeks to attempt reducing so noble a city as "this to the obedience of barbarians, nay, of the most cruel and bloody barbarians " breathing? Is it not much more for their interest, that the Carthaginians should " be removed at the greatest distance from Greece, than that they should be put into of possession of a most rich and fertile island in its neighbourhood? Can any person be fo stupid as to imagine, that they have drawn their forces from the streights of Her-" cules, and the Atlantic ocean, purely to support Icetas, who, if he had acted like an " able general, would never have introduced his country's implacable enemies into its bowels? Was it politic conduct in him to treat his ancestors and natural friends, as the bitterest enemies, which had he not done, he might have enjoyed e "his high dignity, without giving the least offence to Timoleon and the Corintbians?" These discourses being spread through the whole camp, and even reaching Mago's ears, whose army was mostly composed of mercenary Greeks, he pretended to be afraid of a general defection of his troops; and therefore, without hearkening to the intreaties and warm remonstrances of Icetas, who plainly demonstrated to him the weakness of the enemy, he weighed anchor, and set sail for Africa, shamefully abandoning the conquest of Sicily. No other reason can be assigned for this unaccountable conduct, but the timorous disposition of that general, who, conscious of his guilt, on his arrival at Carthage, laid violent hands on himself, to prevent the punishment his cowardice deserved. His body was hung upon a gallows or cross, and exposed f as a public spectacle to the people, in order to deter succeeding generals from forfeiting their honour, and facrificing their country, in so flagrant a manner. Perhaps a more dastardly action is not to be met with in the whole course of history d.

He takes by form that part of Syracule possessed by Icetas.

THE next day, Timoleon appeared before the city with his army drawn up in order of battle; when being informed of Mago's precipitate flight, and feeing the haven quite clear of Carthaginian vessels, he was most agreeably surprised, but could scarce believe his own eyes and ears. He could not forbear ridiculing the cowardice of Mago on this occasion, and therefore, in a pleasant humour, by proclamation, a offered a great reward to any person who could bring him intelligence into what corner of the world the Carthaginian squadron was retired, to make its escape from his formidable sleet. Icetas being determined to defend that part of the town in which he was posted, Timoleon made the necessary dispositions for a general assault. This he divided into three attacks; the first he commanded in person, with a body of chosen troops, against that part of the town situated upon the river Anapus, which was the strongest and most difficult of access; the second he committed to the conduct of Isias, a Corintbian captain, who was to advance from the quarter of Acradina; and the third was to be formed against the post Epipolæ by Dinarchus and Demaretus, who brought the last supply of troops from Corintb. In conformity to b' this plan, the affault was made; and the troops of Icetas being every-where driven from the walls, that part of the city which they held was taken by storm. That Icetas should lose many men in this action, is easy to be believed; but that the Corinthian forces should not have so much as a single man wounded, savours so much of fable and rhodomontade, that Plutarch must excuse us, if we are inclined to be of a contrary opinion o. Timoleon, after the junction of his forces with those of Mamercus and the cities Timoleon above-mentioned, and the reduction of Syracuse, having left a body of troops to drives several defend that capital, marched strait to Leontium, Icetas's metropolis, with an inten-tyrants out of tion to believe it. In consequence of this design, he for down before the place. Sicily. tion to besiege it. In consequence of this design, he sat down before the place; c but finding the garrison very numerous, and being repulsed with loss in several attacks that he made, he was obliged to draw off. He next advanced to Engyon, a city that groaned under the tyranny of Leptines, and so terrified the tyrant by his repeated affaults, that he thought proper to capitulate, and was conducted to Peloponnesus. Apollonia, a neighbouring city under the power of Leptines, upon this, applied to Timoleon for his protection, and obtained it, so that this general now began to be looked upon as the scourge of tyrants, and consequently to be in high esteem amongst the Sicilians; but being in great distress for money to satisfy the demands of his foldiers, he detached a thousand men to make an incursion into the Carthaginian territories. This detachment laying all the enemy's country waste, and pild laging it thoroughly, carried off an immense booty, which they brought to Timoleon, who exposing every thing to public sale, by this means raised a vast sum, and not only paid his army all their past arrears, but likewise advanced them their pay for a considerable time to come. Soon after, he made himself master of Entella, where he put to death fifteen of the citizens, who persisted in their adherence to the Carthaginians, and restored the rest to their liberty. Upon this the Greek cities every-where submitted to him, and were by him restored to the full enjoyment of their rights and privileges. Many cities likewise of the Sicani and Siculi, subject to the Carthaginians, sent embassadors to him, desiring to be admitted among his confederates. Icetas, in the mean time, in conjunction with some Carthaginian auxilie aries, formed the siege of Syracuse. This, in the beginning, he pushed on with vigour; but as Timoleon's garrison behaved with incredible resolution, cutting off a great part of his army by their frequent fallies, and as Timoleon himfelf was now advancing a second time towards Leontium, he was at last forced to abandon the Icetas, having thus lost the best part of his troops in this fruitless expedition, marched And reduces back with great precipitation to Leontium, in order to cover that important fortress Leontium. from all attempts of the enemy, who, as he received intelligence, were advancing towards it. In this he was not milinformed; for Timoleon judging it of the highest consequence to his affairs to reduce Icetas, before the Carthaginians returned into the f island, which they threatened to do in a short time, moved directly towards his frontiers, and appeared before Leontium, without giving him time to recruit his shattered troops, and re-establish his affairs. The tyrant, terrified at this sudden approach, and finding himself incapable of resisting an army so animated by success, was glad to come to a composition with the Corintbian general; the terms of which were, that he should renounce his alliance with the Carthaginians; that his forts should all be demolished; and lastly, that the Leontini should be governed by laws of their own, he residing amongst them as a private person. Having thus detached Icetas from the Carthaginian interest, and extirpated tyranny out of the Greek part of Sicily, he returned to Syracuse, designing to carry the war into the Carthaginian 2 dominions without delay s.

The Carthagitions for carrying on the war with Timoleon.

The senate and people of Carthage, being highly offended at the conduct of their great prepara- and references the last campaign, deprived most of them of their commissions; and refolving to new-model the army, filled the vacant posts with persons of known merit. As they were determined to carry on the war in Sicily with all possible vigour, they ordered levies to be made in all parts of their dominions, and took besides into their service a numerous body of mercenaries, raised in Spain, Gaul and Liguria. Their naval preparations were in all respects proportioned to those made by land; both which being completed, they fent Asdrubal and Hamiltar, two experienced commanders, over to Sicily with an army of seventy thousand men, two b hundred ships of war, and a thousand transports laden with warlike engines, armed chariots, horses, and all forts of provisions. In the mean time Timoleon, having just concluded the war with Icetas, and, by the accession of his troops, considerably reinforced his army, advanced against them with great intrepidity upon the first news of their landing at Lilybaum, though his forces did not amount to above seven thousand effective men. He had, before the arrival of the Carthaginians, detached Dinarchus and Demaretus with a body of choice troops to make an inroad into one of their provinces, where they did not only live for a confiderable time at difcretion, but likewise obliged several of their cities to side with the Greeks, and at their departure carried off a vast sum of money, exacted from the inhabitants, whom they c had laid under contribution. By this means Timoleon was enabled to fettle a military cheft, and establish a fund sufficient for the present exigences of the war. The Carthaginian generals had no sooner landed their forces, but they were apprised of this affront, which they intended fully to revenge; and therefore moving with their whole army towards Timoleon, they at last encamped upon the banks of the river Crimesus or Crimessus. The Corinthian commander was by no means tardy in his approaches to their camp; but on his march one of his mercenaries, by name Thracius, a profligate fellow, who had fome time before been concerned in plundering the temple of Apollo at Delphi, cried out, that Timoleon was not in his right senses, otherwise he would never propose with such a handful of men to attack the Car- d thaginian army. He farther urged, that as the general was leading them to inevitable destruction, if he was not distracted, he must certainly have a design to facrifice them, perhaps because he was not able to pay them their arrears. In fine, therefore, he advised them to go and demand their pay at Syracuse, and not think of attending Timoleon in fuch a desperate expedition h camp.

THE mercenaries, naturally prone to mutiny and sedition, received the harangue his address, pre- of this hot-headed incendiary with applause, and were all of them upon the point of vents a mutiny deserting their standards. But at length Timoleon, by his intreaties, large promises, and from breaking fingular address, brought them back to a sense of their duty, excepting a thousand, who were determined at all events to follow the desperate fortunes of Thracius. After this he wrote to his friends at Syracuse, informing them of what had happened, but e at the same time injoined them to treat the deserters with moderation and humanity, and order the mercenaries their pay. By this means having extinguished all the sparks of sedition, and regained the affection of his troops, he advanced to attack the Carthaginian forces with great ardour and celerity i.

He engages and defeats the Carthaginian

It happened that as he was ascending an eminence to take a view of the enemy's army, he met some mules loaded with parsley, an herb with which the sepulchres of the dead were usually adorned by the antients. This trifling event threw the foldiers into a great panic, as taking it for an omen of very bad fignification. Timoleon, to calm their minds, halted for a moment, declaring that, as the victors at the Istbmian games were crowned with this herb, particularly the Corinthians, it ought f to be esteemed as a symbol of victory, and therefore intreated them to banish all gloomy apprehensions. To remove intirely all impressions of terror from their minds, he made himself a crown of parsley, and the officers, in imitation of their general, did the like. With these round their heads, they approached the enemy with as much alacrity as if they had been sure of a triumph, and thereby inspired the troops with as much resolution as Timoleon had done before the last occurrence happened, by a pathetic speech, wherein he put them in mind of Gelon's signal a victory over the barbarians with an inconfiderable force, and exhorted them to enable him to follow so great an example. Plutarch, an author not a little tinctured with credulity and superstition, adds, that the soothsayers discovered two eagles slying towards them, one of which bore a dragon pierced through with her talons, and the other made a terrible and martial fort of noise (A). These they shewed to the soldiers, and interpreted them as a token of certain fuccess, by which the troops were confirmed in their hopes of an auspicious day. Timoleon therefore, taking advantage of their present disposition, and of the confusion the Carthaginians were in at his unexpected arrival upon the banks of the Crimefus, attacked them with great vigour and resolution. Ten thousand of the enemy's forces, who had already passed the b river, were defeated and put to flight, before the rest could come up to their assist-Great numbers of the enemy perished in this first action; for Timoleon himfelf being at the head of the particular body of troops engaged, they performed But in the mean time the whole Carthaginian army having gained the opposite bank, the battle was renewed, and the victory a long time doubtful. Sicilian horse, under the conduct of Demaretus, charged the enemy in front, before they could form themselves; but could make no impression, the armed chariots (B)

(A) Plutarch says, that just before the beginning of the engagement there ascended so thick a fog out of the river, that neither the enemy's camp, nor any part of the plain, nor even the river itself, was visible, the Greeks only hearing a confused noise of a vast multitude advancing towards them. But the sun-beams at length dissipating the vapours, they observed the Carthaginian army approaching them in the following order: First, the armed chariots, which appeared very terrible; secondly, a body of ten thousand infantry, with white targets on their arms, whom, from the brightness of their armour, and their flow regular march, they took to be native Carthaginians; and lastly, the gross of their army, composed of different nations, who followed the rest in such a disorderly manner, as gave Timoleon great encouragement to attack them. By this it feems to appear, that the national troops in the Carthaginian armies were distinguished in a particular manner from the mercenaries, as well as those of the provinces subject to Carthage (1).

(B) The custom of fighting in armed chariots was undoubtedly of great antiquity. That it prevailed amongst the Greeks, Phrygians, and neighbouring nations, at the time of the Trojan war, is evident from Homer. Herodotus affures us, that the Greeks learned this method of fighting from the Libyans or Africans; and Xenophon intimates, that it was particularly in use amongst the people of Cyrenaica. In the earliest ages the Medes, Syrians, Arabs, &cc. fought in chariots, but especially the Libyans and Ethiopians, as we are informed by scripture. The sacred writings farther speak of two sorts of chariots, one for princes and generals to ride in, the other designed to break the enemies battalions, by being let loose against them. These last were armed with iron, which made terrible havock in the troops that opposed them (2).

The most antient chariots of war mentioned in history are Pharaoh's, which were overwhelmed in the Red sea. The Canaanites, to whom Joshua gave battle at the waters of Merom, had cavalry, and a multitude of chariots; Sifera, Jabin the king of Hazor's general, had nine hundred chariots of iron in his army; the tribe of Judah could not take poffession of all the lands allotted to them, because some of the antient inhabitants were strong in chariots of iron; the Philistines, in the war carried on by them against Saul, had thirty thousand chariots, and fix thousand horsemen; David, having taken a thoufand chariots of war from Hadadezer, king of Syria, ham-strung the horses, and burnt nine hundred chariots, referving only an hundred to himself. These, with many more passages, that might be produced, plainly evince, that armed chariots were used amongst the Phænicians, Syrians, and Egyptians, in very remote Erectheus or Erichthonius, king of Attica, is faid first to have introduced these armed (4) chariots into Greece, though he, in all probability, received them from the Barbarians, amongst whom they were in use long before his time, as is intimated by Eusebius. At the Trojan war the Greek chariots had for the most part only a pair of horses, to which however fometimes a third was added, called by Homer παρήορ , which was tied to them in a more lax manner, according to Eustathius. Dionysius of Halicarnassus fays, that in his time this fort of chariots was used among the Romans, but left off by the Greeks. Sometimes also the most antient Greeks had two pair of horses to their warlike chariots, as may be inferred from Homer. The drivers were frequently persons of the highest distinction, as Pandarus the son of Lycaon, and Hestor the son of Priamus. The person armed in the chariot directed the charioteer which way to drive, and was likewise frequently a person of prime quality, as Æneas, Nestor, and one of Priamus's sons. He generally leaped out of the chariot to engage his enemy, as Paris, Agamemnon, Hercules, and Cygnus, &cc. did. Princes and generals had their chariots adorned with gold and filver, and much curious workmanship, as that of Rhesus in Homer, and even fometimes covered with plates of gold and tin, as that of Diomedes in the same author. The kings of Persia were forbidden by the royal law fo much as to touch the bridles or reins of horfes fastened to a chariot, it being looked upon as inconfistent with the high dignity they enjoyed (5).

The Rhodians consecrated horses and chariots to the fun annually, in conformity to the practice of their Phænician ancestors, as we learn from Festus; and Pausanias, Heliodorus and Strabo affure us, that the Spartans, Massageta, and Ethiopians antiently did the same thing. The scripture observes, that some of the kings of Judah preceding Josah did offer chariots to the sun; which superstitious custom was in imitation of the pagan nations, principally of the k i

<sup>(1)</sup> Plutarch. ubi sup. (2) Hom. in Il. & Odys. pass. Herodot in Melpom. Xenoph. in Cyropad. l. 6. 2 Chron. xvi. 8. Calmet in diff. bibl. (3) Exod. xiv. 7, 10, 17, &c. Josh. xi. 4. Jud. iv. 3. Jud. i. 19. 1 Sam. xiii. 15. 1 Chron. xxiii. 4. 2 Sam. viii. 4. (4) Euseb. in chron. p. 99. & Erasm. Vinding. in Hel. apud Gronov. in these. ant. Grav. s. xi. p. 188. (5) Hom. Il. 3, 8, 10, 11, 13, 16. & alib. pass. Dodys. 13. & alib. pass. Everard. Frithius in antiquit. Homer. l. iv. c. 11. Diod. Sic. l. xvii. Hessod. in Scut. Herc. &c.

posted there keeping them at a distance, and pushing them with such vigour, that a they found it difficult to maintain their ranks. Timoleon, observing this, ordered them instantly to wheel about, and attack the enemy in flank, whilst with the foot he formed a fort of phalanx, joining man to man, and shield to shield, by which the van being rendered firm, he bore down with great fury upon the Carthaginians. These sustained the shock of the Sicilian foot with great intrepidity, and repelling the enemies javelins with their iron and brazen armour, foon came to a close engagement. The Carthaginians had now apparently the advantage, because in such actions as these thrength contributes as much to victory as discipline and military skill. But whilst the enemy were fighting with great courage in this manner, and endeavouring to hem in and furround on all fides Timoleon's small army, there arose on a sudden b a violent storm of hail, thunder, and lightning, which beating on the faces of the Carthaginians, put them into such confusion, that they were not able to stand their ground any longer. At the same time the Crimesus overflowing its banks, occafioned such an inundation, that the enemy were extremely embarassed by it, which heightened their consternation and confusion, and forced them to retire in disorder. The Greeks then, encouraging one another with shouts of joy, pressed them so vigoroufly, that the whole army was driven into the river, where great numbers of them The facred cohort or brigade, as the Carthaginians called it, which were drowned. confisted of two thousand five hundred citizens of Carthage, all men of experienced courage and valour, fought with great resolution, and stood their ground till they c were all cut off to a man. Plutarch relates, that, of ten thousand men who were left dead on the field of battle, above three thousand were native Carthaginians of Persians, as father Calmet thinks, who had horses and chariots consecrated in honour of that luminary. The reason the Rhodians gave for throwing a chariot every year into the sea, in honour of the sun, was, because they believed, that every day he travelled round the earth riding in a chariot (6).

The description of the scythed chariots, mentioned in the Maccabees, as the antients have given it us, is as follows. The beam to which the horses were fastened, was armed with pikes having iron points to them, which projected forward; the yokes of the horses had likewise two long points of three cubits. To the axle-tree also were fixed iron spits, armed at their extremities with fcythes; between the spokes of the wheels were placed javelins, and the very felloes of the wheels were furnished with fcythes, which tore every thing they met with in pieces. The axle-tree was longer than usual, and the wheels stronger, that they might be able to resist the shock of the motion, and the chariot be less subject to overturn. The driver's seat was a kind of little tower made of very folid wood, and raifed breast-high. The charioteer was armed all over, and covered with iron. Sometimes several men well armed were put in the chariots, who fought with darts and arrows (7).

Such chariots as these the Romans sound amongst the antient inhabitants of this island when they first landed here, which very much galled them in their engagements with that people. They were likewise common in the neighbouring parts of Gaul, which is a plain proof, that both these countries were known to the antient Phænicians, except it be admitted, that these machines were invented before the progenitors of the Gauls and Britons sirst came out of Asia. Diodorus affirms, that the military chariots of these remote nations were of the same kind with those used by the antient Greek heroes at the siege of Troy. It appears from different authors, that the Britons had several sorts of chariots, viz. the benna, the carrus or carrum, the covinus, the esseum, and the rheda, all of which, from their names, appear to have been of Phoenician extraction. The effeda seem to have been of the same kind as the Carthaginian armed chariots, from the description Cafar gives us of them; for he tells us, that the charioteers drove through every part of the armies engaged, and threw their darts upon the enemy; that, with the terrible appearance of their horses, and the noise of their wheels, they usually broke the enemies ranks; that, when they had intermixed themselves with the cavalry, the armed men in the chariots flung themselves out, and fought on foot; and, that the drivers in the mean time retiring out of the battle, posted themselves in such a manner, that, if their party was overpowered, they might enable them to make good their retreat. For a full account of their incredible dexterity and agility on these occasions, as well as their particular manner of engaging, we must beg leave to refer our curious readers to Cafar and Dio, or to a future part of this history, to which it will more properly belong (8).

According to father Calmet, it does not appear, that the Hebrew kings ever made use of chariots in war. For though the scripture says, Solomon had fourteen hundred chariots, it does not appear, that they were ever employed by him in any military expedition. Perhaps, as the territories of these princes were very mountainous, chariots, being only fit for the plains, could not be of any great use there. This seems to be confirmed by an observation in scripture, vix. that the tribe of fudah could not disposses the ancient inhabitants of the valleys in their district, because they had chariots of iron. The Carehaginians, who were descended from the old Phoenicians or Canaanites, imitated their ancessors in this particular. They generally posted their chariots in front, and intermixed them with the horse, that when the former had made an impression upon any part of the enemies troops, the latter might be able to charge with the greater vigour, and cut off all those who were put into disorder and confusion (9).

(6) Fest. voce October. Pausan. in Laconic. Strab. l. xi. Heliodor. in Æthiopic. l. x. Vid. & Dan. Clafenium in theol. gent. l. iii. c. 4. 2 Kings xxiii. 11. (7) 2 Macc. xiii. 2. Diod. Sic. l. xvii. D. Curt. l. iv. Kenoph. Cyropad. l. 6. (8) Cas. de bel. Gal. l. iv. Dio Cass. l. xii. p. 706. in Ner. & alib. ed. Hanov. 1606. Diod. Sic. l. iv. p. 209. (9) 1 Kings x. 26. Jud. i. 19. Christ. Hendr. in republ. Carthag. l. ii. c. 2. p. 515, 516.

a the best families in Carthage, and that, according to the Punic records, such a number of persons of distinction never fell in any battle before, the Carthaginian armies being for the most part made up of Africans, Spaniards, Numidians, &c. so that when they received any remarkable defeat, it was generally at the expence of other nations. Besides the slain, there were above fifteen thousand taken prisoners; all their baggage and provisions, with two hundred chariots, a thousand coats of mail, and ten thoufand shields, fell into Timoleon's hands, and were either sent to Corinth, and there dedicated to Neptune, or hung up in the temples of Syracuse. The spoil, which consisted chiefly of gold and silver plate, and other furniture of great value, was, according to Plutarch, so immense, that the whole Sicilian army was three days in colb lecting it, and stripping the slain. In fine, after Timoleon's troops had passed the river, and taken possession of the enemy's camp, they found there such an incredible quantity of gold and filver in different forms, that nothing of inferior value was at all regarded; for the commander in chief divided the whole among the foldiers, referving nothing for himself but the glory of so famous a victory. It must not be forgot, that this memorable battle was fought on the twenty-seventh day of the month Thargelion, which was Timoleon's birth-day, nor that all the other engagements of note he was concerned in, if Cornelius Nepos may be credited, happened on the same day. The wonderful success it was attended with, is a full proof of the great force of superstition; for, next to the violent storm above mentioned, this e unparallelled victory was owing to the happy turn Timoleon gave to a frivolous accident confidered as a fatal omen. This certainly shewed him to have been a man of genius, and perfectly well acquainted with the dispositions of his countrymen, as well as with the general bent of mankind at that time; and Polyanus takes notice of it as an instance of the great military capacity of that general k.

THE news of fo fignal a victory obtained over the professed enemies of the Greek Which occasions name, could not but be highly agreeable to the people both at Corinth and Syracuse, great joy at Corinth and especially at it was like to be attended with such happy consequences. The Corin-Syracuse, thians adorned their temples with the Carthaginian spoils, which they hung up there with inscriptions upon them, importing, that the people of Corinth, and Timoleon d their general, offered them to the gods as an acknowledgment for their having made them the instruments of delivering Sicily from Carthaginian servitude. Timeleon having left his mercenaries upon the enemy's frontiers, in order to plunder and ravage their whole country, returned to Syracuse with the rest of his army, where he was received with all possible demonstrations of joy. 'Tis worthy observation, that all the punishment he inflicted upon the thousand mercenaries, who were accomplices of Thracius, for their infamous desertion above-mentioned, was only banishment from Syracuse; however, he ordered them all to be gone before fun-set 1.

Icetas, according to Plutarch, after this, being tired with his private station, shewed Icetas conan inclination to reinstate himself, if possible, in his dominions; and in order thereto, cludes another e found means, in conjunction with Mamercus, tyrant of Catana, to strike up another Carthaginians, treaty with the Carthaginians. In consequence of this fresh alliance, that nation equipped a fleet of seventy sail, and took a strong body of Greeks, of whose valour they had now a great opinion, for the first time, into their service, intending to try their fortune once more in Sicily. Gisco, the brother of Hanno, a general of great experience and bravery, was recalled from banishment to command the troops destined for the new expedition. This news soon reaching Sicily, occasioned fresh commotions there. The inhabitants of Messana, entering into an affociation against Timoleon, put four hundred of his men, left as a garrison in that place, to the sword; a detachment of mercenaries under the command of Euthymus the Leucadian, being f drawn into an ambuscade by the Carthaginian troops at Hiera, were all cut off to a man; and whilst Timoleon was on his march to Calauria, Icetas, being reinforced by a Carthaginian party, made an incursion into the territories of Syracuse, carrying off a confiderable booty, and, in contempt of Timoleon, passed by Calauria itself, the place where that general was then posted. However, he pursued the tyrant with a body of cavalry, attended with some of his light infantry, who could march with expedition. This Icetas perceiving, passed the river Damyrias with some precipitation; and drawing up his troops on the other fide, put himself into a posture a to receive the enemy. In the mean time, a dispute arising amongst Timoleon's officers, who could not agree which of them should pass the river first to attack Icetas, the general ordered them to cast lots, upon which every one of them threw a ring into Timoleon's robe, and the first that was taken out, and exposed to public view, had the figure of a trophy engraven for a feal upon it. This greatly encouraging the troops, they fell with incredible fury upon Icetas, who not being able to sustain the shock, was put to flight, with the loss of a thousand men killed upon the spot, and pursued to the city of Leontium. Upon this defeat, the tyrant himself, his son Eupolemus, and Euthymus, general of his cavalry, were brought bound by their own foldiers to Timoleon. The two first were immediately executed, as tyrants and tray- b tors, and the last murdered in cold blood. Icetas's wives and daughters likewise fuffered death, after a public trial. Plutarch blames Timoleon (C) for not preventing this last execution, which, he infinuates, that general might have done, had he interposed in the affair, and censures it as the only blot in his character; tho' we think his conniving at the murder of Euthymus, a brave man, who was put to the sword by the Corintbian foldiers for speaking with some contempt of them, ought to be looked upon as another of the same kind. After this, he moved with his forces towards Catana; and meeting Mamercus, gave him battle in the plains of the river Abolus. The dispute was for some time warm and bloody; but at last the tyrant was overthrown, his army intirely dispersed, and above two thousand men left dead upon c the field of battle. As the greatest part of these last were auxiliaries sent to Mamercus by Gifco, the Carthaginians themselves suffered considerably in this action m.

* PLUT. & DIODOR. ubi sup. Corn. Nep. in vit. Timol. c. 5. ed. August. Van Staveren, Lugd. Bat. 734. Vid. & Bosium in loc. Polykn strat. l.v. c. 12. ex. 1. Dion. Petav. ration. temp. p. 1. l. iii. 10. ed. Par. 1641.

PLUT. & DIODOR. ubi sup. c. 10. ed. Par. 1641.

And is overthrony by Timolcon.

A peace conthe Carthaginians.

NOTWITHSTANDING the warlike preparations they were making at Carthage eluded between for the invalion of Sicily, the senate had sent embassadors to Timoleon to attempt Timoleon and striking up a peace with him, imagining, perhaps, that he would be the more inclined to a pacification, when he faw them in a condition to continue the war. The two last blows given their confederates disposed them still more strongly to an accommodation, to which they found Timoleon not averse, as he was apprehensive of fresh troubles from Mamercus and others, against whom he wanted to turn his arms. A peace was accordingly fettled on the following terms: That all the Greek cities should d be set free; that the river Halycus, or, as Diodorus and Pluarch both call it, the Lycus, should be the boundary between the territories of both parties; that the natives of the cities subject to the Carthaginians should be allowed to withdraw, if they pleased, to Syracuse, or its dependences, with their families and effects; and lastly, that Car## m Iidem ibid.

(C) We have already observed, that Timaus Siculus exalted Timoleon to a superiority above the highest divinities, and that he was greatly censured for this by Suidas. The last author's words are to this effect: " If Callisthenes descreedly suffered death "for deligning to deify Alexander, a prince infi-initely more illustrious than Timoleon, what did "Timeus deserve? Gre." This passage seems to contradict most, if not all, of those writers who have given us any account of Alexander's atchievments, viz. Justin, Q. Curtius, Plutarch, &c. who represent Callishenes as inflexibly determined not to deity Alexander, nor even to allow him that kind of adoration which the Persians paid their king, when many of his fycophants, particularly Anaxarchus, would have made him that high compliment. Nay, these writers seem unanimously to agree, that he lost Alexander's favour by his obstinacy in this particular, and even at last was put to death by him. Now, in order to reconcile Suidas with these authors, it must be observed, that Timaus extolled Timoleon in his history; and therefore Suidas must intimate, that Callishenes had an intention to deify Alexander in his bistory of that prince, otherwife the comparison is impertinent and absurd. Admit this, and the passage in Suidas does not at all clash with what the authors above-mentioned have observed of Callisthenes, because it bears no relation to them as taking notice of that philolopher's refusal to adore Alexander whilst at the head of his army in Asia. Arrian assures us, that Callisthenes, out of a vanity peculiar to himself, declared, that Alexander should in future ages be esteemed as a god from the history he would write of him, and not from those idle stories his mother Olympias imposed upon the world. This comes up to the point, and feems to be what Suidas had particularly in view. As for that author's affirming, that Callisthenes suffered death for his intention to deify Alexander in his history, no more can be meant by it than this, viz. he was put to death by that very prince whom in this history he intended to deity, which was a just punishment inflicted upon him by the gods for his great impiety. That this reconciliation is just, will appear from a perusal of the passages referred to in Suidas and Arrian, as likewise from the drift and scope of Suidas's observation: we cannot therefore help expressing our surprize, that M. Bayle should not have been able to discover the confishency betwixt Saidas and the above-mentioned historians (10).

(10) Suid. in Tipato. Juftin. l. xii. c. 7. D Curt. l. viii. c. 5. Diog. Laert, in Ariftot. Plutarch in Alex. & Arrian. l. iv. p. 165. Edit. Gronov. Lugd. Bat. 1704.

a thage should not for the future give any assistance to the remaining tyrants against the Syracustans 1.

ABOUT this time one Hanno, who, according to Justin's account of him, was the Hanno endeamost opulent and powerful citizen in Carthage, formed a design of subverting the vours to make constitution there, and introducing arbitrary power. In order to accomplish this, at Carthage. he proposed to invite the senators to a grand entertainment on the day of his daughter's marriage; and there, by mixing poison with his wine, to destroy them all, not doubting but such a tragical event would at once make him master of the republic. Though the scheme was carried on with great secrecy, yet it came to be discovered by some of his servants; but his interest in the city was so great, that the govern-b ment did not dare to punish so execrable a crime. The magistrates therefore contented themselves with only preventing it, which they did by passing a law prohibiting too great luxury and magnificence at weddings, and limiting the expence on fuch occasions. Hanno, seeing his stratagem deseated, was resolved to have recourse to arms, and for that purpose assembled all his slaves, and fixed upon a day a second time to put his defign in execution. However, he was again discovered; but, to avoid punishment, he retired with twenty thousand armed slaves to a castle, that was very strongly fortified, and from thence applied to the Africans, and the king of the Mauritani, for assistance, but without success. He was asterwards taken prisoner, and carried to Carthage, where being severely whipped, his eyes were put out, his c arms and thighs broken, that punishment might be inflicted on every part; and at last he was executed in the presence of all the people, to deter others from such flagitious attempts; after which his body was hung on a crofs or gibbet. His children and all his relations, though they had not joined in his guilt, shared in his punishment. They were all sentenced to die, that not a single person of his family might be left, either to imitate his crime, or revenge his death. Plutarch mentions one Hanno as admiral of the Carthaginian fleet in the beginning of the late war between Icetas and Timoleon, who, in all probability, was the very person Justin reprefents as so infatuated with ambition, especially as he was, if that author may be credited, very fond of shew and parade. However this may be, since Justin makes d him cotemporary with the younger Dionysius, and Orosius affirms this conspiracy to have happened in the time of Philip king of Macedon, we think from hence we are fufficiently authorized to place that event here o. WE must likewise observe here, that Diodorus Siculus places Alexander's reduction Q. Curtius of Tyre in the first year of the 112th olympiad, and Agathocles's descent on Africa in suits of a the third of the 117th; and consequently that Q. Curtius must have been out in his missake. chronology, when he makes these two events to have happened about the same time, as anticipating the latter full twenty-two years by this synchronism. What the last of these authors relates of the arrival of certain Tyrian embassadors at Carthage, to implore the affistance of that potent republic against Alexander, has a greater appearance of truth; fince not only a good understanding, but a most cordial friendship, e always subsisted between Carthage and Tyre, and even at this time most of the inhabitants of the latter were transported to the former of these cities. The extremity to which their countrymen (for fo these two states always called one another) were reduced, touched the Carthaginians in a most sensible manner, though, by reason of some domestic troubles, they were then incapable of sending them any succours. However, though they were unable to relieve, they at least thought it their duty to comfort them on this melancholy occasion, and therefore dispatched to Tyre thirty of their principal citizens to express their grief, that the bad situation of their own affairs would not permit them to spare any troops. The Tyrians, though frustrated of their hopes, did not despond, but took all the necessary measures for a vigorous Their wives and children they put on board some vessels, in order to fend them to Carthage; by which being delivered from all apprehensions of danger, with regard to what was the dearest to them of any thing in nature, they were prepared against all events, and thought of nothing but making the most strenuous efforts to repel the enemy. Curtius intimates, that the Carthaginians offered annually a facrifice to the tutelary gods of Tyre, confidering them as their protectors; and that when their embassadors came to Tyre on this occasion, they persuaded the Tyrians to stand it out to the last, promising powerfully to support them. As this very

計圖與此行是所以可以知此此能

726

M

* PLUT. & DIODOR. ibid. . Justin. l. xxi. PLUT. & OROS, ubi fup.

historian observes, that the seas at that time were blocked up by the Carthaginian a fleets, and that by the hopes of mighty succours they spirited up the Tyrians to oppose Alexander's whole force, 'tis not very probable, that they should be then engaged in fo dangerous a war as that with Agathocles was, or be reduced to fo deplorable a condition as they must have been in, when that general, after giving them a notable defeat, advanced to the very walls of Carthage. He therefore seems not to be intirely confistent with himself in this particular; for which reason, as well as upon account of Diodorus's superior authority in the point before us, we must be g leave to diffent from him, and look upon the arrival of the Carthaginian embaffadors at Tyre, as coincident with the transactions of the period we are now upon ?.

The Carthagimians fend Ha. micar Rhodasions.

THE Carthaginians, hearing of the reduction of Tyre, and the great progress Alex- b. ander made in the east, began to be under some apprehensions for their own salety, nus to Alexan as fearing that prince's good fortune might be as boundless as his ambition. But der, in order to they were much more alarmed, when they received advice, that he had made himdiscover that felf master of Egypt, was advancing towards the west, and had built alexandria prince's intenupon the confines of Egypt and Africa, in order to rival them. They imagined now he might in reality have an intention to unite Africa and Afia under his dominion, and aspire to universal monarchy. They therefore chose one Hamilear, (or, as Gellius intimates, Astrubal) surnamed Rhodanus, to sound the inclinations of that prince, and endeavour to pry into his counsels. Being a person of wonderful address, as well as great eloquence, though at the same time of great subtilty and art, he made it c his utmost endeavour to infinuate himself into Alexander's favour. Having obtained an audience by means of Parmenio, he declared to the king, that he was, by the cabals of his enemies, banished Carthage, and begged he might have the honour to attend him in all his future expeditions; which being granted, he did his country fignal fervice by communicating many important discoveries relating to Alexander's schemes. The manner of this communication being somewhat singular, we shall give it our readers from Gellius. He prepared tables of wood, in which he cut out the letters or characters of his epiftle, and afterwards covering them with wax, as was the custom of that age, without any characters upon it, sent them away as blanks. This the people at Carthage being before apprifed of, decyphered d the contents; which could not have been eafily done by others, had the dispatches been intercepted, because the manner of writing then was upon the wax itself, and confequently the whole must have been looked upon as a blank. We do not find, that Alexander ever discovered the treachery of this Carthaginian, or even entertained the least suspicion of him; which is a further proof of the refined genius of that nation for all works of intrigue. Upon his return home, notwithstanding his eminent services, he was considered as a betrayer of his country, and was accordingly put to death at Carthage, by a fentence as barbarous as it was ungrateful 1.

In the fecond year of the hundred-and-fourteenth Olympiad, Thimbro, after he had affaffinated his friend Harpalus in Crete, failed with a body of mercenaries to e Cyrenaica, and being joined by fome exiles, who were perfectly well acquainted with all the by-ways and passes there, endeavoured to make himself master of that country. Having given the natives a defeat, they were obliged to apply to the Carthaginians, whose dominions were contiguous to theirs, for relief; which they thought that state, in point of good policy, could not well resuse them. This we learn from Diodorus; but as the whole country was immediately after conquered by Ophellas, and delivered into the hands of Ptolemy, 'tis very probable the Carthaginians were not then at leisure to assist them.

The Syraculians elect Aga-Schiftratus.

A few years afterwards, Sosistratus, who had usurped the supreme power at Syracuse, having been forced by Agathocles to raise the siege of Rhegium, returned with his shat- f thocies their general against tered troops to Sicily. But soon after this unsuccessful expedition, he was obliged to abdicate the sovereignty, and quit Syracuse. With him were expelled above six hundred of the principal citizens, who were suspected by the populace to have formed a design of altering the plan of government, which then prevailed in that city, as we have already related in the history of Syracuse. As Sosistratus and the exiles thought themfelves ill treated, they had recourse to the Carthaginians, who readily espoused their cause. Hereupon the Syracusians recalling Agathocles, who had before been banished by Sosistratus, appointed him commander in chief of all their forces, principally on a account of the known aversion he bore to that tyrant. The Carthaginians supplying Sosistratus with troops, he immediately affembled an army, and advanced at the head of it, to do himself, and his fix hundred adherents, justice. After the two armies approached one another, feveral marches and counter-marches, and even fome skirmishes happened, each side striving to gain some notable advantage. Agathocles, in all these military movements and falsifications, acquired great reputation, both for his valour and policy. He frequently contrived some stratagem or other, which turned out much to the advantage of the Syracufians, of which the following was one of the most remarkable r.

P DIOD. Sic. I. xvii. Q. Curt. l.iv. c. 3. 9. Justin, l. xxi. c. 6. Frontin. frat. l.i. c. 2. ex. 3. Aul. Gell. noct. At. l. xvii. c. 9. Onos. l. iv. c. 6. Vid. & Ene. in Poliorcet. c. 31.

THE Syracustan army having encamped near Gela, Agathocles, with a detachment Agathocles b of a thousand men, found an opportunity of entering the city in the dead time of makes an the night; but being instantly charged by Sosistratus with a strong body of troops, surprise Gela, he was obliged to retire with the loss of three hundred men. All the rest now looked but is repuljed. upon themselves as lost, though Agathocles behaved with great intrepidity and resolution. However, having received seven wounds, being ready to faint for loss of blood, and hearing the enemy advancing from all parts to furround him, he ordered his trumpets to found a charge at both parts of the walls. This greatly alarmed the Carthaginians, who now imagined, that another party of the Syracufians had forced their way into the town to relieve their companions. As the darkness of the night did not permit them to discover the truth, they thought proper to put an c end to the pursuit; and dividing their forces, posted away to the places from whence the trumpets founded, in order to defend the walls. In the mean time Agathocles, at the head of his detachment, arrived fafe in his own camp. By this artifice, he not only preserved the seven hundred men that first entered, but seven hundred more that were fent afterwards to his affiftance'.

THIS war did not continue long; for Sosistratus, and the exiles, being foon received Agathocles again into the city, a treaty of peace was concluded between Carthage and Syracuse. Swears to do The Syracusians now finding, that Agathocles began to exercise a sovereign power over Syracuse, to his fellow-citizens, and take such measures as plainly shewed, that he aimed at mo- the prejudice narchy, had recourse anew to Corinth for a general to command their forces. Accord- of the demod ingly one Acestorides was sent them to fill this post, who, upon his arrival, found cracy there. that Syracuse could never enjoy a perfect tranquillity as long as Agathocles was alive; and therefore formed a defign of dispatching him, which he attempted to execute in the manner already related in the third volume of this work. But Agathocles by a stratagem eluded that attempt; and making his escape, raised a body of forces in the heart of the island, with which he prepared to attack Syracuse. The Carthaginians being apprised of this, were struck with terror as well as the people of Syracuse; and therefore, at the instigation of the former, the latter thought proper to re-admit him, to avoid the fatal consequences of a civil war; however, he was obliged to swear in a solemn manner, that he would do nothing to the prejudice of the e democracy (D).

Notwithstanding the solemn oath he had taken, Agathocles still pursued the But breaks point he had before in view, and, by a general massacre of the principal citizens, this oath. at last raised himself to the throne of Syracuse. Not content with this, he proposed makes himself to turn his arms against the other cities of Sicily, having a design to make himself cuse, and conmaster of the whole island. Beginning therefore with Messana, he seized upon a cludes a treaty fort in the territory of that city; and being informed, that the walls were in a rui-with the Metanous condition, he attempted at the head of a body of horse to surprise Messana mediation of itself. But missing his aim, he laid siege to the castle of Myla, which surrendered the Carthagito him. Soon after he renewed his attempt upon Messana; but the citizens, knowing nians. f what treatment they were to expect, if the city fell into his hands, defended them-

* Diod. Sic. l. xix. c. 1. Idem ibid. Max. l. vii. c. 4. Univ. hist. vol. iii. p. 81.

DIOD. SIC. ubi fup. Justin. l. xxii. VAL.

(D) It appears from Diodorus and Justin, as this last author's text is emended by Sebifius, that these folemn oaths were usually taken in the temple of Ceres, and that at taking them the persons generally put their hands on the altar of that goddess. Juvenal and Virgil illustrate this point to satisfaction. Scheffer, Tanaquil Faber, and Gronovius, agree with Sebisius, but Vorslius differs from him; though the passage this last author produces from Plutarch, equally supports both opinions (1).

(1) Diod. Sic. l. xix. c. 1. Justin. l. xxii. c. 2. Juvenal. sat. xiv. 238. Virg. En xii. 102. T. Liv. l. xx. Plaut. in rudent. 5, 2, 49. Plut. in Dio. Fid. & Brisson. formul. l. viii.

Vol. VI. Nº 10.

felves

selves with great bravery, and repulsed him in several attacks. In the mean time, a the Carthaginians, being applied to, sent embassadors to him, complaining of such a notorious infraction of former treaties. The tyrant, at that time not caring to draw upon himself the whole power of Carthage, submitted to the terms prescribed him; and in consequence of his peace with the people of Messana, concluded by the mediation of Carthage, he not only drew off his army from before their city, but restored likewise the castle of Mylæ to them. Upon which the Carthaginian embas. sadors, having happily executed their commission, returned back to Africa .

Several Sicihim, but at last make a thagmian ge-

But the restless spirit of Agathocles would not suffer him to be quiet. The cities lian cities enter therefore of Gela, Messana, and Agrigentum, entered into a confederacy against him, into a confeder and fent to the Lacedæmonians for a general, not daring to trust any of their own b principal citizens, as suspecting them to be too much inclined to arbitrary power. But observing that Acrotatus, who came from Sparta to command their forces, was peace with him more cruel and bloody than even Agathocles himself, they not only refused to act tion of Hamil- under his conduct, but even attempted to stone him. Hamilear therefore, the Carcar, the Car- thaginian general, judging this a favourable juncture to accommodate matters between Agathocles and the confederated cities, proposed a treaty of peace to both parties, which was at last made upon the following conditions: First, that the Carthaginians should remain in possession of Heraclea, Selinus, and Himera; and secondly, that all the other cities dependent on the Syracustans should be governed by their own laws. By this treaty it seems to appear, that the cities above-mentioned were at that c time greatly in the interest of the Carthaginians w.

Agathorles breaks this treaty, and prepares for a war with Carthage;

Agathocles, finding his subjects disposed to second his ambitious views, shewed as little regard to this last treaty as he had before done to his oath; and therefore, in violation of the second article of it, he first made war on the neighbouring states, and afterwards carried his arms into the very heart of the island. He was attended in these expeditions with extraordinary success, insomuch that in the space of two years he brought intirely under subjection all the Greek part of Sicily. This rapid progress alarmed the Carthaginians, who faw their territories there threatened with the fame fate; especially as the tyrant had strengthened himself by many alliances, and besides a potent army, made up of his own forces, and those of his allies, had a body of d mercenaries, confisting of ten thousand foot, and above three thousand horse, all excellent troops. On the other hand, Agathocles, being sensible that both his power and proceedings gave great umbrage to the Carthaginians, and that they were very angry with Hamilcar for being instrumental in concluding the late peace, made all the necessary preparations, not only to put himself into a good posture of defence, but even to act offensively, in case of a war with Carthage. Things being in this fituation, it was morally impossible but that a rupture must soon commence r.

And commits great depredations in the territories of

IT is intimated by Justin, that Agathocles was at first supported by the Carthaginians, or rather by Hamilcar, their general in Sicily; nay, he affures us, that the tyrant effected the massacre above-mentioned by the assistance of five thousand Afrithe Carthagi- cans fent him by Hamilcar. After the reduction of the other parts of Sicily, he made incursions into the Carthaginian territories, and those of their allies, where he committed great depredations, Hamilear not offering to give him the least disturb-This highly incenfed the people of those districts, who looked upon themfelves as betrayed by Hamilcar; and therefore fent letters to Carthage, filled with bitter complaints of his perfidious conduct, and Agathocles's tyranny; adding moreover, that, by the late infamous peace, many cities in alliance with Carthage had been facrificed and delivered up into the tyrant's hands. This greatly exasperated the senate; but as Hamilear was invested with great power in Sicily, they judged it prudent to suspend their resentment till the arrival of Hamilton, the son of s Gisco. In the mean time, they came to a vigorous resolution concerning him; but, for the reason just hinted, did not think proper to declare this openly, but threw all the fuffrages that passed it into an urn, which they sealed up, till the other Hamilear came from Sicily. But the general, being surprised by death, escaped thereby the punishment prepared for him at Carthage; and Hamilear, the son of Gisco, was appointed to succeed him in the command of the forces. This incident hastened the rupture between Agathocles and the Carthaginians y.

Dion. Sic. ubi fup. c. 4. 7 Justin ubi fup.

THE last place that held out against Agathocies was Messana, whither all the He enters into Syracusian exiles had retired. His general Pasiphilus at first marched against it with a second treaty an army; but having before received instructions from Agathocles to act as he should fanians, and think fit for the good of his service, and finding that force would prove ineffectual, infringes it. he cajoled the inhabitants into a treaty. This Agathocles likewise infringed when in possession of the town, cutting off all such as had formerly opposed his government; for as he intended to prosecute the war against Carthage with the utmost vigour, he thought it a point of good policy to deltroy, if possible, all his enemies in Si-

In the mean time the Carthaginians arrived with a fleet of fixty fail at Agrigen- The Carthagib tum, and obliged Agathocles to defift from an attempt upon that place, which a little mans prevent before he had projected. But as they had not brought a sufficient body of land forces, Agrigentum; he ravaged all the adjacent country, plundered the subjects of the Carthaginians, notwith andand took several of their forts by storm. Whilst he was thus employed, another ing which he Carthaginian squadron of fifty ships entered the great harbour of Syracuse, and sunk ravages all the two transports, one of them an Athenian, which were all the vessels then in port. try, and takes The Carthaginians, according to their usual cruelty, cut off the hands of all those several Carthey found on board, though they had not offered them the least injury, it being this mind forts impossible for them to make any resistance. This barbarity was soon retaliated by from. Agathocles upon the Carthaginians; for several of their galleys, having been separated

c from the rest of the fleet upon the coast of Italy, fell into his hands, when he served all the prisoners taken therein in the same manner .

THE Carthaginians, being informed that Agathocles had pillaged their territories The Carthagiin Sicily, and that his forces grew very numerous upon the frontiers, refolved to nions offenible affemble an army without delay, in order to reduce that tyrant. As they had received army to appose advice, that he had offered battle to a confiderable body of their troops posted upon him, and the hill Ecnomos, who were obliged to decline his challenge, they were determined to encamp near pursue the war with more vigour than they hitherto had done. Having therefore Himera. reinforced the troops intended for the Sicilian expedition with two thousand native Carthaginians, among whom were many persons of quality, a thousand Etruscan d mercenaries, as many slingers from the Balearic islands, and two hundred chariots, they transported them to that island, under the command of Hamilear, as abovementioned, to put a stop to the tyrant's conquests. The sleet, consisting of an hundred and thirty long ships, in the passage was dispersed by a violent storm, in which Hamilear loft fixty ships of war, and two hundred transports, with a great number of men. Many persons of the best families of Carthage were lost by this disafter, which caused a public lamentation in that city, when the walls were all hung with black, as usual on such melancholy occasions. Hamilear, notwithstanding his loss, being joined on his arrival by such of the Sicilians as hated Agathocles, found upon a muster, that his army consisted of forty thousand foot, and five thousand e horse. With these he took the field, and encamped near the city of Himera, defigning to come to blows with the enemy as soon as a fair opportunity offered b.

In the mean time Agathocles, finding the Carthaginians much superior to him, Agathocles concluded that many cities would join them, particularly that of Gela. What con- deleated by the firmed him in this opinion was, a blow he had lately received, twenty of his gal-Carthaginians leys, with all the troops on board, having fallen into the hands of the Carthaginians. To prevent the inhabitants of Gela from declaring against him, he found means gradually to introduce a party of his troops into the town, who not only pillaged it, but put four thousand of the citizens to the sword, threatening to use all others in the fame manner, who did not immediately produce their treasure. Having thus a Idem ibid.

* Diod. Sic. ubi fup. c. 6.

b Diop. Sic. ubi fup. c. 7.

(E) In the midst of these troubles, Dinocrates asfembled a large body of troops, which confifted chiefly of Syracusian and Messanian exiles. Having a great antipathy to Agathocles, he sent a considerable detachment under the command of Nymphodorus. one of his captains, to reduce the city of Centuripe, which was then garrisoned by that tyrant's troops; but Nymphodorus was killed in this attempt, and his men forced to raife the fiege with great loss. Dinocrates sent to the Carthaginians for affistance in this expedition; but whether or no he received any from them, Diodorus tells us not. However, Agathocles took from hence an occasion of accusing the Centuripians of having formed a conspiracy against him, which gave him an opportunity of cutting off all those whom he suspected to be disaffected to his government (2).

filled his coffers with wealth, and left a strong garrison in the place, he moved with a his forces towards the Carthaginians; and possessing himself of an eminence opposite to the enemy, there encamped. The Carthaginians had posted themselves upon the hill Ecnomos, on which Phalaris's castle, where he tortured offenders in his brazen bull, formerly stood; and Agathocles took post in another of that tyrant's castles, which from him was called Phalerios, upon the opposite height, being separated from Hamilear by a river which ran between the two camps. As a prophecy or tradition had long prevailed there, that a great battle should be fought on the banks of this river, in which a vast carnage should be made, neither side for a long time shewed any disposition to begin the attack, both armies having a superstitious dread upon At last a party of Africans, by way of bravado, passed the river, and an- b other of Agathocles's troops, to return the compliment, did the same; and this brought on a general engagement. For the Sicilians, driving off some cattle and beafts of burden belonging to the enemy, were pursued by a Carthaginian detachment, which immediately upon its arrival on the opposite bank, fell into an ambuscade, that Agathocles, forefeeing what would happen, had laid there to intercept it; and not having time to form itself, was easily routed. This first instance of success greatly encouraged Agathocles, who hereupon moving out of his camp, attacked Hamilcar with his whole army, and with incredible bravery forced his trenches; though he fustained great loss from the slingers of the Balearic islands, who (F) with stones of a large fize broke to pieces the shields and armour of his foldiers, and destroyed c him abundance of men. But at this critical juncture a strong reinforcement unexpectedly arrived from Carthage, which intirely changed the face of affairs; for the Sicilians having before made their utmost efforts, became greatly dejected upon the arrival of these succours, and, almost as soon as the enemy rallied, took to their heels, and were so hotly pursued, that all the plains of the Himera were covered with dead bodies. The heats being then excessive, great numbers, that were ready to perish with thirst, drank too copiously of the river-water, which was salt and brackish, and thereby lost their lives. The Carthaginians had sive hundred men killed in this battle, but Agathocles at least seven thousand c.

Upon which the people of Carana, Leontium, Taurominium, Abacœnum, and Messana. submit to them.

AFTER this defeat, Agathocles, collecting the shattered remains of his army, burnt d his camp, and retired with great precipitation to Gela. He had not been there long, before some of his troops, by chicane, deluded three hundred African horse into the place, all of whom to a man he caused to be cut off. The tyrant remained fome time in Gela, that he might draw the enemy thither, and thereby prevent the siege of Syracuse, till the inhabitants of that place had got in their harvest. Hamilear, being informed, that Gela was defended by a strong garrison, supplied abundantly with all forts of provisions, and military stores, did not think think fit to make an attempt upon it, but contented himself with reducing the forts and castles in the neighbourhood of that place, all of which furrendered upon the first summons. As he behaved in a very affable manner, the people of Camarina, Catana, Leontium, e and Taurominium, fent embassadors to him to implore his protection; as did soon after those of Messana and Abacanum, though they were before at variance amongst themselves. In such perfect abhorrence did the people over the whole island hold the tyrant and all his adherents d(G). Agathocles, finding the Carthaginian general not disposed immediately to undertake either the siege of Gela or Syracuse, repaired to the latter of these places; and having filled his magazines, reinforced the garrison, and perfected all the works, he shut himself up within the walls of his metropolis. Thither the Carthaginians

And Agathocles shuts himfelf up within the walls of Syracuse.

· Idem ibid. & Justin. 1. xxii.

d Diop. Sic. ubi fup.

(F) Diodorus tells us, that all these Balearic slingers had been trained up in the art of slinging from their infancy, and consequently were very expert in that art; that they frequently attacked the enemy with stones of three pounds weight, which did great execution; and that in fine the Carthaginians wrested many victories out of the enemies hands almost intirely by their efforts. Our readers may expect a further account of them from Lycophron, Diodorus, Vegetius, and others, when we come to the history of Spain (3).

(G) Justin intimates, that there was a second action between Hamilear, the son of Gisco, and Agathoeles, before the Carthaginians laid siege to Syracuse, wherein the latter was totally routed, and obliged to shut himself up within the walls of his metropolis (4).

a followed him, and laid close siege to that important place, which, if they could have taken it, would foon have put them in possession of the whole island .

THE Carthaginians having cut off a great part of Agathocles's army, stripped him The Carthagiof his confederates, and got all Sicily, except Syracuse, into their hands, the tyrant mans push on now found himself driven to a state of desperation. Being therefore abandoned by that metropohis allies from their abhorrence of his enormous cruelties, he formed a design of so lis, and Agabold, and, in appearance, so impracticable a nature, that nothing but the success, thocles, with with which it was attended, could justify the undertaking of it. This design was to a body of troops, transfer the war into Africa, and besiege Carthage at a time when he himself was Africa. besieged in his metropolis, which was the only city lest him in Sicily. His project

b he communicated to no person whatsoever, but only told the Syracusians in general terms, that he had found out an infallible way of freeing them from the impending calamities, and repairing all the losses they had sustained to that day. He then chofe the most daring and intrepid among the foldiers and citizens of Syracuse, ordering the foot to be ready with their arms at the first call, and the horsemen to carry each along with him, besides his arms, a saddle and a bridle. Before his departure he gave free permission to all persons, who were not willing to go through the fatigues of a siege, to (H) retire out of the town, which many of the principal citizens, Justin says sixteen hundred, accepted of; but were scarce got out of the place, when they were cut off by parties posted upon the roads for that purpose. He

- c fet at liberty all the slaves who were able to bear arms, and, after obliging them to take an oath, incorporated them among his troops. Having seized upon the estates and effects of those persons who left the city, he raised a considerable sum, which was intended in some measure to defray the expence of the expedition he was going upon; however, he carried with him only fifty talents to supply his present wants, well affured that he should find in the enemy's country whatever was necesfary to his subsistence. His forces being all embarqued, he appointed his brother Antandrus governor of Syracuse in his absence, with forces and provisions sufficient to hold out a long siege; and taking with him his two sons Archagathus and Heraclides, he went on board last himself, where he waited some time for a fair wind. d All people were at a loss to conjecture, what design he was going upon: some ima-
- gined his intention was to fail to the coast of Italy or Sardinia, to plunder those countries; others, that he proposed ravaging that part of Sicily belonging to the Carthaginians; but most persons agreed, that it was a desperate project he had in view. As the Carthaginians had a much superior sleet, and blocked up the mouth of the harbour, he was obliged to watch several days for an opportunity to set sail. At last a large fleet of transports appeared laden with corn and other provisions for Syracuse. To intercept these, the Carthaginians put to sea, and Agathocles no sooner faw the mouth of the harbour open, but he likewise hoisted sail, and, by the great activity of his rowers, foon got out into the main ocean f.

THE Carthaginians, seeing a squadron of fixty galleys, (for so many did this of And after a Agathocles contain) at first imagined, that the enemy's fleet was fent to defend the flight engagetransports; and therefore, tacking about, prepared for an engagement. But observ-Carthaginian ing that this foundron continued its course strait forward, and was for before the ing that this squadron continued its course strait forward, and was far before them, sleet, makes a they immediately gave it chace, crowding all the fail possible. However, Agatho- descent there. cles so bestirred himself, that, night coming on, they lost sight of him; and in the mean time the transports, unexpectedly escaping the danger, plentifully supplied the city with corn, and all other provisions. The next day a most remarkable (I) eclipse

e Idem ibid. & Justin. ubi fup. POLYEN. Strat. l. v. c. 3. ex. 5.

f Diod. Sic. l. xx. c. 1. & Justin. ubi sup. Oros. l. iv.

(H) Polyanus relates, that vast numbers of Syraeustans having crowded on board the fixty vessels, of which Agathoeles's fleet consisted, the tyrant gave free liberty to all who were not willing to be engaged in a desperate expedition, to retire with their effects. Many, embracing this offer, withdrew into the town, all of whom Agathoeles, who looked upon them as cowards, ordered to be put to the sword 15).

(I) Diodorus and Justin both affirm this to have been a solar eclipse; but Frontinus makes it a lunar

one. The last author has however been corrupted in the passage referred to, so that the critics can scarce make sense of it. From the two former writers, as well as many others, that might be produced, it appears, that the antients believed the eclipses of the luminaries to have portended great revolutions in human affairs; and it must be owned, that this notion, as well as some other points in judicial astrology, is of a very high antiquity (6).

(5) Polyan. Arat. 1.v. c. 3. ex. 5. (6) Diod. Sic. Juftin & Frontin. in loc. citat. Vid. & Peucerum de divinat. p. 661. Vol. VI. Nº 10.

of the fun happened, when the stars appeared every-where in the firmament, and a the day seemed to be turned into night. As the Sicilians were not a little superstitious, this event struck the troops on board with terror, every one believing it to be a presage of their approaching destruction. But Agathocles revived the drooping courage of his foldiers, by telling them, that if they had feen this before their departure from Sicily, it would have portended a disappointment to them; but that, as it happened afterwards, it predicted a train of disasters to the Carthaginians, whose dominions they were going to invade. He further remarked, that these eclipses always foretold fome instant change; that therefore happiness was taking its leave of the enemy, and coming over to them. The Carthaginian admiral, finding that, by pursuing two sleets at once, he had missed them both, and that Agathocles did not return, resolved to pursue him close, and prevent him from kindling the b war in some other place. Having therefore sailed six days and six nights steering his course towards Africa, he at last came up with the Sicilian sleet, then upon the point of landing the forces on board. As both fquadrons had the coast of Africa in view, the Carthaginians made the utmost efforts to attack Agathocles before he could reach the shore; and on the other hand the tyrant, knowing what his fate would be, if he fell into the hands of fo cruel an enemy, was no less active in his endeavours to land, before the Carthaginians could engage him. In fine, he had just begun to execute his defign, when part of the Carthaginian fquadron coming up with his rear, a flight engagement enfued. The weapons chiefly made use of on this occasion were bows and slings, the vessels not being close enough to grapple. As c but a small part of the Carthaginian fleet found it possible to engage, and the mariners were quite tired with rowing, Agathocles gained the advantage; whereupon the Carthaginians, tacking about, stood off a little above the cast of a dart. This gave him an opportunity of landing his troops at a place called the quarries, without any farther opposition 8.

Scon after his

Agathocles, having landed his forces in the enemy's country, and fecured for the bans his ships. present his shipping by a breast-work or parapet, offered a solemn sacrifice to Ceres and Proferpina, the guardians of Sicily. After this he summoned a council of war, composed of such officers as were intirely at his devotion; where, appearing in his royal robes, he acquainted them, that when they were so closely pursued by the d Carthaginians, he had applied himself to the two goddesses, promising, upon his arrival in Africa, to confecrate all the vessels of the squadron to them, by reducing them to so many burning lamps; and that, fince they were now delivered from the enemy, his intention was to perform his vow by burning the whole fleet. He exhorted them to distinguish themselves on the present occasion, declaring that by the facrifices the gods promifed great fuccess. He likewise observed, that the only way to draw the enemy out of Sicily was to carry the war into their own country; that the Carthaginians were foftened and enervated by ease and luxury; that the Africans under their subjection, as well as the neighbouring states, being highly incensed at the Carthaginian insolence, would join them on the first news of their & arrival; that the cities of Africa were not fortified and built on mountains, as in Sicily, and therefore could not make any defence; that the boldness only of their attempt would quite disconcert the Carthaginians, who were altogether unprepared to repel an enemy at their own gates; that no enterprize could redound more to their honour and advantage, fince this would, if attended with fuccess, make them masters of all the wealth of Carthage, and transmit their names and same to the latest posterity. In fine, he desired them not to be dismayed at the loss of their ships, fince the two goddesses above-mentioned would hereafter return them a far greater number. Having uttered these words, a servant brought him a torch, which he eagerly catching hold of, went on board his own ship, and set it on f fire. All the officers did the like, and were chearfully followed by the foldiers. As the flames mounted up, the trumpets founded from every quarter, and, after a joint prayer to the gods to grant the army a fafe return home, the whole shore echoed with joyful shouts, and loud acclamations. In short, the soldiers fanfied themselves already masters of Africa; and not having been allowed time to reflect on the proposal made them, the whole fleet was in a moment confirmed.

a This feems to have been one of the most desperate actions to be met with in

THE motives for this altonishing point of conduct were various: First, Agatho- The motives cles was desirous of putting his troops under a necessity of conquering, which he for this conduct. imagined might be done by the destruction of his fleet, since this would leave them no other refuge but victory. Secondly, he considered that he had not one good harbour in Africa, where his ships could lie with safety; wherefore, as the Carthaginians were masters at sea, they would infallibly possess themselves of all his shipping, which was no-ways in a condition to cope with theirs. Thirdly, in case he had left as many troops as were necessary to defend the fleet, he would have b thereby fo weakened his army, which was at best but inconsiderable, that he could not have ventured a battle with the enemy, and of course would have rendered himself incapable of drawing any advantage from this unexpected diversion. These, with other reasons, determined him to act in the manner above-mentioned, and exert that prodigious courage necessary to work up his troops to such an unparallelled resolution. As they had been hurried on by a blind and impetuous ardour, when they began to cool, things appeared in another light. They now confidered themselves as in the midst of an enemy's country, separated from their own by the vast ocean, without the leaft hopes or means of escaping. Upon this, a sad and melancholy silence succeeded that transport of joy, which but a moment before had been c so general in the army i.

But to dissipate all gloomy apprehensions, Agathocles marched instantly at the He advances head of his troops against a place in the territories of Carthage, called the Great towards Carthage, leaving the foldiers here again no time for reflection. The whole country, place called through which he passed, afforded the most delicious and agreeable prospect imagin-the Great City, On each fide were spacious meadows covered with flocks of all kinds of and gives the cattle, country-houses built with extraordinary magnificence, delighful avenues planted flunder of it with all forts of fruit-trees, charming gardens of a prodigious extent, and kept with all possible care and elegance, &c. The whole tract was likewise watered by beautiful streams, and full of towns adorned with stately palaces belonging to the nobid lity of Carthage, many of whom inhabited this particular province. As they had enjoyed a long peace, nothing but a face of plenty and abundance here appeared, and an immense quantity of wealth was amassed in every part. This inchanting scene raised the drooping spirits of the soldiery, who thought the possession of so fine a country would make full amends for all the toils and fatigues that could be undergone. They advanced therefore with intrepidity to the Great City, which, after a feeble relistance, they took by ftorm. As Agathocles was defirous of inspiring his troops with fresh courage, he abandoned the plunder of the place, which was very considerable, to them. That this was a town of importance, and called in the Punic language Samath, Sumeth, or Samatho, is in some degree probable from e Alexander Polybistor, Stephanus, and others k. FROM hence the tyrant moved with his army to Tunis, a city of eminence in the He likewife neighbourhood of Carthage, which being intimidated by so unexpected a visit, sur-takes Tunis, rendered on the first summons. The troops would willingly have garrisoned both as mell as the these places, and laid up in them the plunder they had got; but Agathocles would above-mentiby no means liften to such a motion. He, with some difficulty, convinced them, oned city, with that this was not confistent with the plan he had laid down, nor at all expedient in the ground. their present circumstances. Being therefore determined, that his men should have no place to retire to in case of any missortune, that they might place all hopes of fafety in victory, he caused both the cities lately reduced to be levelled with the h Diod. Sic. Justin. Frontin. Polyæn. & Oros. ubi fup. 1 Diod. Sic. Justin. &c. ubi fup. Vid. & Polyb. l. xxii. & Athen. deipnosoph. l. iii. 1 Diod. Sic. & Just. ubi fup. Alexand. Polyhist. in Libyc. l. iii. apud Steph. de urb. & Bochart. Chan. l. ii. c. 12. 1 Diod. Sic. ubi fup.

(K) This conduct of Agathocles, how wild and highly approved of by Scipio, as we learn from Polybius. That great general looked upon Agathocance of time, who are not so well acquainted ith the springs and motives to it, nor the cir forme points of his conduct, which much facilitated extravagant foever it may appear to us at this di-flance of time, who are not fo well acquainted with the fprings and motives to it, nor the circumstances of his and the Carthaginian affairs, was the conquest of Carthage (7).

f ground, and encamped in the open fields 1.

The Carthaginins are

In the mean time the Carthaginians on board the galleys, that came up with Aga- a greatly alarm thocles, just before he made his descent, expressed great joy upon seeing the Sicilian ed at this mo- ships all on a blaze, imagining this to be the effect of fear. But they changed their note, when they observed the enemy marching in good order up into the country, being then convinced, that a push was intended to be made at Carthage itself. Hereupon they immediately spread a great number of hides upon the fore-castles of their ships, which was with them a constant signal of some impending public calamity. They also carried on board their own vessels the iron beaks belonging to the Sicilian ships that had been destroyed, and dispatched an express to Carthage to give the senate a particular account of every thing that had happened. But the whole country was so alarmed upon the first appearance of the enemy's squadron on the b African coast, that, before his arrival, the news of their unexpected descent had reached Carthage, and thrown the whole city into the utmost terror and confusion. They all concluded, that their army before Syracuse had been deseated, and their fleet lost; for that, in any other situation of affairs, it was possible for Agathocles to leave Syracuse, and pass over into Africa, they could not believe. The people hastened with trembling hearts to the market-place, while the senate assembled in a tumultuous manner to deliberate how they might fave the city, which the victorious enemy was with long marches advancing to besiege. They had no army in readiness to make head against the enemy; and their imminent danger did not permit them to wait, till forces were levied among their allies. Some therefore were c for fending embassadors to Agathocles to propose an accommodation, and at the same time to discover the posture of the enemy; others apprehended it would be better to receive a more perfect intelligence of the true state of affairs, before any public step was taken; and this opinion prevailed m.

Who bowever make preparations to give the enemy a warm receb-

WHILST the city was in this ferment, the courier fent by the Carthaginian admiral arrived, and informed the fenate of the destruction of the Sicilian fleet, and that Agathocles was advancing with his army into the heart of their dominions. However, he gave them to understand, that their troops in Sicily were all sase and in good condition; that they pushed on the siege of Syracuse with the utmost vigour; that the body of forces under Agathocles was not very confiderable; and that the d advantage he had lately gained by sea was attended with no other consequence in his favour, than that it enabled him barely to land his troops. This pacified the minds of the people, so that by degrees they recovered from the panic they were lately thrown into; though the fenate feverely reprimanded the fea-officers for their negligence in suffering the enemy to make a descent, when they were masters at sea. It was now refolved, that the citizens should be armed; and accordingly in a few days they had on foot an army of forty thousand infantry, and a thousand cavalry, with two thousand armed chariots. They appointed Hanno and Bomilcar to command the forces, notwithstanding the grudges that had long subsisted between their respective families, hoping that, laying aside all private animosities, they would e jointly exert themselves in the defence of their country, and not permit any family quarrels to interfere with the public welfare. In this however they were deceived; for Bomilear, having long thirsted after arbitrary power, passionately wished for an opportunity of subverting the republican form of government at Carthage; which believing the post above-mentioned would enable him to do, he readily accepted of it with that view only. As the Carthaginians frequently brought false accusations against their generals after the conclusion of a peace, and through envy put many of them most unjustly to death, 'tis not to be wondered at, that sometimes, in order to avoid such perfidious treatment, they either resigned their commissions, or attempted to introduce arbitrary power. Of this Bomilear was an instance, as will more fully f appear by-and-by n.

Agathocles commits great ravages in Africa, and prepares to engage the Carthaginians.

In the mean time Agathocles committed great ravages, razing several castles, and burning many villages on his march, though his army did not confift at most of above fourteen thousand men. The Carthaginian generals, to find him other employ, immediately took the field, and advancing towards him with great celerity, at last possessed themselves of an eminence in sight of his camp, and drew up their a forces in battle-array. Hanno commanded the right wing, supported by the (L) facred cohort; Bomilear the left, making his phalanx very deep, fince the nature of the place would not permit him to extend his wing farther in front; and the cavalry and chariots were placed, as usual, in the van. Agathocles, on the other hand, made a proper disposition of his forces, which were composed of Syracusians, Samnites, Etruscans, Celtes, and Greek mercenaries. The right wing he committed to the conduct of his fon Archagathus; the other, at the head of the troops of the houshold, and a thousand cuirassiers, opposite to the Carthaginian sacred cohort, he commanded himself; and lastly, the slingers and archers, to the number of five hundred, were distributed in both wings to the best advantage. Finding several of his soldiers b unarmed, he obliged them to draw the covers and cases of shields over a quantity of rods collected for that purpose, and to carry those before them, as if they had been real. By this stratagem, though none of the most refined, he imposed upon the enemy, who were at some distance from him, and prevented the nakedness of his troops from being exposed to their view .

Agathocles was in no small consternation, when he saw so numerous an army ready to And by a straengage him. However, he dissembled his fear, and, in order to encourage his men, tagem, together who were quite dispirited, and under great apprehensions of the enemy's horse and with Bomil-car's treachery, chariots, he let out several owls, which he had before prepared for that purpose. intirely over-These slying about the camp, and lighting on the soldiers shields, so raised their throws them.

c spirits, that of their own accord they began to advance against the enemy, not doubting but by the affiftance of Minerva, to whom that bird was facred, and therefore looked upon by the whole army as a good omen, they should gain a complete victory. The first charge was made by the enemy's chariots, and the cavalry intermixed with them; but the body of Sicilian troops opposed to them, did not only withstand their efforts with incredible bravery, but pierced some of them through with darts and arrows, and drove the rest back into the midst of their own soot. This naturally threw the foot into confusion, and occasioned the defeat of the horse; for these, finding themselves deprived of their chief support, were easily broken, and never afterwards made the least attempt to rally. However Hanno, with the sacred cohort, d which confisted of the flower of the troops, sustained a long time the fury of the enemy, and even put them into disorder; but being overwhelmed with showers of darts, and covered with wounds, he fell, fighting bravely to the last. His death obliging the right wing to give ground, inspired Agathocles and his troops with such ardor, that they bore down all before them, though for some time they were most vigorously opposed by the enemy. Bomilcar, understanding that his collegue was flain, looked upon this as a favourable opportunity put into his hands by the gods of possessing himself of the sovereignty, to which he had long aspired. Tho' therefore it was in his power to have changed the face of things, yet being sensible, that he could not accomplish the design he had in view, if the army of Agathocles were e destroyed, but might easily put it in execution, if the enemy conquered, he resolved to retire with the forces under his command, not doubting but he should be able to get the better of Agathocles whenever he pleased. Accordingly acquainting his men with Hanno's death, he injoined them to keep their ranks, and retire in good order to a neighbouring hill, as the only means to escape the sury of the victorious enemy. As by the general's direction the retreat was so precipitate, that it looked like a downright flight, the Africans in the rear imagined, that all the rest of the army were totally routed, and therefore immediately fell into disorder; which being observed by Agathocles, he took advantage of this confusion, and pursued them so

(L) The facred cohort confifted of the fons of fenators, and the prime nobility, who feem to have had their tents placed near that of the general. His aids de camp were taken out of this body, and the officers of it were his principal companions. The precise number of this corps cannot be determined; but from Appian we may conclude, that it consisted of about four thousand men. It was known to the Romans by the appellations facra cohors, stipatores, pratoriani, deletta cohors, and answered to the evocati and ablecti of that nation. In fhort, it was a body composed of voluntiers of distinction, who might be looked upon as the general's guard, and particular friends. Curtius intimates, that Amyntas had a guard of Macedonian youths something refembling these. For a further account of them, we must refer our readers to the authors cited in the margin (8).

(8) Diod. Sic. l. xx. Appian, in Libyc. D. Curt. l. v. & Chrift. Hendr. de rep. Carehag. l. ii. § 2. m. 1. Vol. VI. Nº 10, 9 R close. close, that they were obliged to take to their heels, as their companions before had a done, whereby he gained a complete victory: The facred cohort however fought with great bravery, even after the death of Hanno, and courageously advanced over the dead bodies of their fellow-foldiers, till they saw themselves abandoned by the whole army, and in danger of being furrounded by the enemy. Then indeed they thought it proper to have some regard to their own safety, and therefore retiring in good order, gained an eminence, where they halted, and endeavoured to make head against those who pursued them; but not being supported by Bomilear, they were either cut off, or forced to fave themselves by flight, after having distinguished themselves in a very eminent manner. That general, after the defeat of his army, retired to Cartbage, not having been pursued far by Agathocles, who returned back with b great expedition to take possession of the enemy's camp. This he allowed his soldiers to plunder for their further encouragement; where, among other rich spoils, they found many chariots of curious workmanship, that carried twenty thousand pair of fetters and manacles, which the enemy had provided for the Sicilian prisoners, not doubting but they should fill all the dungeons in Carthage with them. Of the Sicilians, according to Diodorus, not above two hundred were flain, and about a thousand Carthaginians, or, as others will have it, six thousand. Justin makes the loss to be pretty equal on both sides; for he tells us, that two thousand Bicilians, and three thousand Carthaginians, fell in this battle. As Bomilear quitted the field of battle without fighting, and Agathocles did not long continue the pursuit, it is pro- c bable, that the flaughter was not very confiderable, and that both fides suffered pretty much alike, especially since the facred cohort behaved to the last with such unparallelled resolution. Justin likewise differs from Diodorus in his account of the strength of the Carthaginian forces in this action; for whereas the former will have that hoft to have been very numerous, the latter relates, that it confifted only of thirty thoufand men. Be this as it will, the Carthaginians received a notable defeat, when they thought themselves in a manner certain of victory; God, as our historian here observes, being pleased, by this instance, to let them know, that HE is the supreme disposer and arbiter of events P.

The Carthaginians endeawour to appease some deities, whom they imagined they had effended.

THOUGH the Carthaginians had sustained no very considerable loss in the late d engagement, they were extremely disheartened, believing the gods fought against They could not imagine it possible for Agathocles, after his whole army had been totally routed in Sicily, and he reduced almost to the necessity of surrendering his metropolis, to land in Africa, in spite of a powerful fleet, with the shattered remains of his broken troops, and afterwards defeat a numerous body of forces, without the interpolition of some superior being. Under the influence of this persuasion, they make it their first endeavour to appease the offended deities, particularly Hercules and Saturn, whom they confidered as the tutelar gods of their country. From the foundation of their city, they had fent the tenth part of all their revenues annually to Tyre, as an offering to Hercules, the patron and protector both of Carthage e and its mother city. This custom for many ages had been religiously observed; but their revenues at last growing immensely large, they not only had omitted to raise the tenths facred to Hercules in proportion, but even discontinued their antient acknowledgment to that deity. For this facrilegious avarice they now imagined themselves punished; and therefore, to expiate their guilt, they made a public confession of their infincerity, and sent the golden shrines of their other deities to Hercules at Tyre, having a notion, that fuch facred gifts would make a more effectual atonement. As for Saturn, in antient times it was usual to facrifice children of the most noble families to him, as has been above observed; but for some years past in these sacrifices they had substituted children of mean extraction, secretly bought and f bred up for that purpose, in the room of those nobly born. This they now considered as a departure from the religion of their forefathers, and a remarkable failure of paying this divinity the honours due to him, and consequently were conscious of having given him just cause of offence. To expiate the guilt of so horrid an impiety, a facrifice of two hundred children of the first rank was made to the bloody god, and above three hundred other persons, in a sense of their dreadful neglect, voluntarily offered themselves as victims, to pacify, by the effusion of their blood, the wrath of this deity. Such were the fentiments of the Carthaginians at this juncture, and fuch the method, they apprehended, would prove the most effectual in reconciling the offended deities to them, whom they imagined the immediate authors of the bad success that attended their arms; though it is probable, that soon after, upon the discovery of Bomilear's perfidious conduct, they admitted at least of the concurrence of an inferior cause 4.

AFTER these expiations, the Carthaginians thought it not improper likewise to And recal Hamake use of human means for their preservation; they therefore dispatched messen milcar from gers to Hamilcar in Sicily, with advice of what had happened in Africa, and express orders to hasten over to the relief of his country. When the messengers arrived, Hamilear commanded them not once to mention the victory of Agathocles; but, on b the contrary, to give out amongst the troops, that he had been intirely defeated, his forces all cut off, and his fleet destroyed by the Carthaginians. The senate of Carshage had fent to Hamiltar by the messengers all the beaks of the Syracusian ships, that this report might more easily gain credit; for it was by their orders that he had caused it to be propagated. Hamilear therefore, in consequence of these orders, immediately fent the persons newly arrived from Cartbage to Syracuse, to publish this anelancholy news there, and at the same time, in confirmation of it, to produce the iron beaks of the ships pretended to be taken from the enemy. This they did, summoning the governor and citizens to deliver up the city, fince they could expect no soccours, their army and fleet in Africa being utterly ruined. At first this sad account e was generally believed, and greatly affected the whole city; but the leading men, to prevent all commotions, dismissed the messengers without any answer, and soon after expelled eight thousand of their citizens, who seemed disposed to an insurrection. This threw every part of the city into the utmost confusion, the women running about the streets in a distracted manner, and every house being filled with outcries and lamentations. Some bewailed the death of Agathocles and his sons; others the loss of their friends, who were supposed to be cut off in Africa; and great numbers their own hard fate, in being driven, with their wives and children, into the hands of the enemy. But Hamilear entertained the exiles with great kindness; and being informed by them of the deplorable condition the city was in, he resolved to make a a general affault on all quarters at once. Tho' he expected easily to carry the place, as believing it to be almost destitute of troops to defend it, yet he first sent new deputies to Autandrus the governor, promiting to spare him, and all those who sided with him, if he delivered the city up into his hands. Hereupon a council of war was summoned, at which all the principal officers were invited to assist; when, after much debate, Antandrus, being a man of a mean spirit, and very unlike his brother, declared himself for a capitulation; but Eurymnon the Ætolian, whom Agathocles had left to affift his brother with his advice, prevailed upon him and the rest to hold out, till they had certain intelligence of the truth. Hamilcar, being apprifed of the reso-Intion the garrison had taken, prepared his battering-engines to play afresh upon e the walls, and made all the necessary dispositions to storm the town without delay r.

WHILST matters remained in this situation, a galley with thirty oars arrived in Who, upon this, the harbour of Syracuse, whose rowers, crowned with garlands, and singing the Io raises the siege Pean, made directly to the city. This vessel Agathocles caused to be built immedi- and sends a ately after the battle; and having manned it with some of his best rowers, under the detachment of conduct of his intimate friend Nearchus, dispatched it to Syracuse, to carry thither five thousand the agreeable news of his late victory. The Carthaginian guard-ships, discovering it, mento Atrica. gave it chace so briskly, that it narrowly escaped falling into their hands; which it must infallibly have done, had not the Syracusians advanced to its relief, when it was within a dart's cast of the shore. Hamilcar, observing that the garrison slocked down f to the port on this occasion, and believing that he should find the walls unguarded, ordered his foldiers to rear up scaling-ladders, and begin the intended assault. The enemy having left the ramparts quite exposed, the Carthaginians mounted them without being discerned, and had almost possessed themselves of an intire part lying between two towers, when the patrol discovered them. Upon this a warm dispute enfued; but at last the Carthaginians were repulsed with considerable loss. Hamilton therefore, finding it in vain to continue the siege, after such glad tidings had restored life and resolution to the Syracusians, drew off his forces from before the place, and fent a detachment of five thousand men to reinforce the troops in Africa.

POLYB. p. 944. Q. Curt. I. iv. c. 2, 3. Pescen. Fest. apud Lactant. divin. instit. i. c. xxi. Diod. Sic. ubi supra, &c. r Idem ibid.

Agathocles,

Agathocles, after his victory, reduces most of the places of note in the proper territory of Carthage.

Agathocles, after his victory over the Carthaginians, finding no enemy to oppose a him, reduced many forts and castles in the neighbourhood of Carthage. Many cities likewise, either out of fear, or aversion to the Carthaginians, joined him, by which his army being confiderably reinforced, he moved towards the maritime towns. having left a body of troops to defend his fortified camp at Tunis. The first place he attacked was the New City; which he carried sword in hand, but treated the inhabitants with great humanity. He then advanced to Adrumetum, and laid siege to it. The Carthaginians, by degrees recovering from the consternation they were thrown into by the late defeat, and being informed of the progress Agathocles made, as also of his being supported by Elymas king of Libya, immediately assembled another army, and marched against Tunis. After a stout resistance, they made themselves b masters of the enemy's camp, and by their repeated attacks so pressed the town, that it was soon reduced to great extremity. Agathocles, receiving intelligence of the enemy's success, lest the greatest part of his army to carry on the siege of Adrumes tum, and, with a small body of troops, privately posted himself on the top of a mountain between Adrumetum and Tunis (M), from whence he could take a view both of his own camp and that of the Carthaginians. Here he ordered his foldiers in the night to make large fires, that the Carthaginians might think he was advancing at the head of a formidable army to the relief of Tunis; and, on the other hand, the garrison of Adrumetum might be induced to believe, that a strong reinforcement was coming to his camp before that place. The stratagem answered both these views; c for the Carthaginians raised the siege of Tunis hereupon with so much precipitation, that they left all their battering-engines behind them; and the Adrumetines were fo intimidated, that they immediately capitulated. Thapfus he afterwards took by storm, and reduced in that tract above two hundred cities and towns, partly by force, and partly by composition. Justin intimates, that he put a great number of people to the fword in this expedition; but as the contrary seems to appear from Diodorus, we must suspend our belief of this particular. Perhaps the author above-mentioned took this article from Timœus Siculus, who painted all the expeditions of Agathocles, and his whole life, in the blackest colours. Be that as it will, he made himself master of the whole territory of Carthage; but hearing that Elymas, king of Libya, in violation of the late treaty, had declared against him, he immediately entered d Libya Superior, and in a great battle overthrew that prince, putting to the fword a good part of his troops, and the general that commanded them. This blow obliged the Libyan monarch to recal the body of auxiliaries he had fent to aid the Carthaginians, and enabled Agathocles to march against that nation, who, he was acquainted, had formed the fiege of Tunis a second time. Advancing with great expedition, he at length encamped within two hundred stadia of the enemy, and commanded his foldiers not to make any fires at all. This prevented the Carthaginians from having any suspicion of his approach; so that marching all night with wonderful celerity, he arrived by break of day in the neighbourhood of their camp; where meeting with a body of their forces, that had been plundering and laying waste the adjacent e country, he charged them with fuch vigour, that two thousand were killed upon the spot, many taken prisoners, and the rest dispersed. The Carthaginians, being extremely mortified at this disaster, and receiving advice, that Elymas had been obliged to recal the troops sent to their assistance, without waiting for Agathocles, abandoned the siege t.

Hamilcar intians, and his head fent to Agathocles in

It has been before observed, that Hamilear sent only a detachment of sive thoutirely defeated fand men to the relief of his distressed country: keeping therefore the main body of by the Syracu- his forces together, he still entertained hopes of obliging Agathocles to quit Africa, and return to the defence of his own dominions. He spent some time in making Dion. Sic. ubi fupra.

(M) The learned and ingenious Dr. Shaw supposes mount Zow-aan, or Zag-wan, a conspicuous mountain in the inland part of the fummer circuit of the Tuniseens, to have been the place from whence Agathocles was entertained with a view both of the country of the Adrumetines and Carthaginians. Solinus intimates, that the foot of this mountain was one of the limits of Africa Propria; which, in conjunction with the name, renders it fomething probable, that the Regio Zeugitana re-ceived its denomination from it (9).

<sup>(9)</sup> Dr. Shaw's geograph. observat. relating to the kingdom of Tun. c. 3. p. 184, 185. Solin. c. 27. Vide & Strab. l. x. p. 326.

- a himself master of such cities as sided with the Syracusians; and after having brought all their allies under subjection, returned again to Syracuse, hoping to surprise the city, by attacking it in the night. The Syracufians were, before the approach of the Carthaginian army, reduced to some streights; for Hamilear had not only cut off all supplies of provisions, that might have come to their relief by sea, but likewise destroyed all the corn and fruits of the earth he could meet with in their territory, and had attempted to possess himself of the castle of Olympia or Olympiaum, lying before the town. However, they were not discouraged, but took all the necessary measures for a vigorous defence; and suspecting Hamilton to have formed a design of furprising the city, they, by way of precaution, ordered a body of three thouland b foot and four hundred horse to take post in Euryalus, the citadel of Epipola (N). About midnight, Hamilear advanced, at the head of a strong party, to begin the attack, and was supported by Dinocrates, general of the horse. His army was divided into two phalanxes, one formed of the Carthaginian forces, the other of the Greek mercenaries, which were followed by a confuted multitude, composed of various nations (O), who attended the army for the sake of plunder. The passes being then rough and narrow, this unwieldy rabble for some time found it impossible to move forwards; and therefore the barbarians, of which it confifted, quarrelling for the way, came at last to downright blows; which put the whole army into confusion. The Syracusians posted at Euryalus, taking advantage of this, made a fally, and after c having terribly galled the Carthaginians with their darts and arrows from the hill, attacked them in form. Hamilear at first received the enemy with great resolution, crying out to the officers to do their duty, and endeavour to animate their troops to sustain the shock of the enemy; but the Syracusians having seized upon the passes, and there not being room for so numerous an army as Hamilear's to act, great numbers of the Carthaginian foot were trod to death by their own horse; and the confusion they were at first thrown into being heightened by the darkness of the night; one part of their army engaged the other; so that the rout became general, and the flaughter dreadful. Hamilcar therefore, being deserted by all his army, which, before the engagement, amounted to an hundred and twenty thousand foot, and five d thousand horse, was taken prisoner, and carried into Syracuse. Diodorus relates, that an baruspex, or foothsayer, before the beginning of the action, predicted, that Hamilear should sup the next night in Syracuse; which though it proved true, yet the entertainment he there met with was not much to his fatisfaction; for those, whose parents and relations he had barbaroufly murdered, led him in chains about all the streets of the city, and after having vented their rage on their miserable captive by all forts of torments, struck off his head, and sent it into Africa, a welcome present to Agathocles, who, advancing to the enemy's camp, and shewing them the head of their general, struck them with such terror, that their commanders with the utmost
  - difficulty kept them from abandoning the camp, and returning to Carthage ". THE day after this defeat, the Carthaginians rallied their shattered troops at some The Agrigendistance from Syracuse; but having lost their general, they could not agree amongst veral places themselves about the choice of his successor: the exiles and Greek mercenaries there- from the Carfore pitched upon Dinocrates for their commander, and the Carthaginians vested with thaginians and the supreme command of the national troops the Carthaginian officer who was next Syracusians. in dignity to the late general. The Agrigentines, finding the Carthaginians and Syra-

DIOD. Sic. l. xx. c, 1. Justin. l. xxii. c. 7. sub init. & Oros. l. iv. c. 6.

(N) Diodorus here makes a fine reflection on the uncertainty of war, and infinuates, that neither valour nor conduct has the greatest share in bringing it to a happy conclusion. Agathocles, one of the greatest captains of his age, at the head of a numerous army, was routed by Hamilcar at the battle of Himeta; and yet soon after, this very victorious army, weakened only by an inconsiderable detachment sent to Africa, and consisting then of an hundred and twenty thousand foot, and five thousand horse, was intirely deseated by a small party of the routed enemy, supported only by the advantageous situation of the post they were ordered advantageous situation of the post they were ordered to defend (10).

(O) From this passage it appears probable, that the Carthaginian armies were attended by a numerous rabble in all remarkable expeditions. This will enable us to account for the prodigious carnage made of their troops when the enemy was victorious; for such an undisciplined number of people must first greatly contribute towards throwing the regular troops into confusion; and then, not being able either to resist, or escape, be totally cut off. The Turks labour under the same inconvenience at this day, or at least have done to till of late.

(10) Diod. Sic. in loc. citat.

cusians had extremely weakened each other by this bloody war, and that the latter a were in great diffress for want of provisions, judged this a favourable opportunity of seizing upon the sovereignty of the whole island themselves; and therefore set on foot a confiderable army for that purpose, appointing Xenodicus, one of their countrymen, general. This army was foon reinforced by a considerable body of troops from the city of Gela, which Xenodicus had found means to engage in the Agrigentine interest. He first made himself master of Enna, and then marched to Herbessus (P), that was defended by a Carthagimian garrison. Upon his arrival there. he immediately caused it to be attacked. For some time the garrison made a vigorous defence; but at last the inhabitants declaring in favour of the besiegers, the town, after a brisk action, was taken; on which occasion a great number of Careba- b ginians were killed, and above five hundred taken prisoners. In fine, the Agrigontines profecuted this war with fuch fuccess, that in a short time they wrested many places of note both out of the hands of Agatheeles and the Carthaginians w.

The Cuthag'nians gain an advantage over the Syra-

THE Syracusians in the mean time being threatened with a famine, and understanding, that some vessels laden with corn were coming to the enemy, fitted out twenty galleys to intercept them. As the Carthaginians had entertained no suspicion of cutians by fea. fuch an attempt, the Syracustans found an opportunity of slipping by them, and for fome time pursued their course in quest of the transports above-mentioned. But the Carthaginians, being apprifed of what had happened, purfued them with thirty galleys; and coming up with them off of Hybla, immediately attacked them. At c first the Syracusians seemed to prepare themselves for a warm engagement; but being foon driven on shore, they abandoned their ships, and taking shelter in the temple of Juno, endeavoured there to defend them against the Carthaginians. After a sharp dispute, the latter, by means of their grappling-irons, carried ten of them off; but the rest were drawn on shore by the assistance of the garrison of Hybla, who, upon the first news of the action, advanced to the relief of the Syracusians.

The Carthaginians greatly dejected at the defeat of their army, and death of their general, in Si-

Agathocles, having forced the Carthaginians to raise a second time the siege of Tunis, and reduced all the places subject to them, prepared now to besiege Carthage itself; and, in order thereto, advanced with his army to a post within five miles of that capital. On the other hand, the Carthaginians, notwithstanding the great losses d they had fullained, in order to cover the city, encamped betwixt it and the enemy with a powerful army. This was the face of affairs, when Agathoeles received advice of the defeat of the Carthaginian forces before Syracuse, and the head of Hamiltan their general, who being taken prisoner in the action, had been put to death in Syracuse, as above related. Upon receiving this agreeable news, Agathocles rode up to the enemy's camp, and shewing them the head, gave them an account of the total destruction of their army in Sicily. This threw the whole army into the utmost conflernation, and filled every part of the camp with outcries and lamentations. barbarians, according to the custom of their country, proftrated themselves before the head of their prince; for Hamilear, at the time of his death, according to Diodorus, was one of the Carthaginian suffeces. In short, they were so dejected at the first publication of this melancholy account, that, in all human probability, Again thocles would foon have made himself master of Carthage, and put a glorious end to > w Diod. Sic. ubi fup. c. 2. 3 Idem ibid.

(P) That the cities of Enus and Herbessus were of Phanician or Carthaginian extraction is apparent from the names themselves. The former is undoubtedly a Greek corruption of Ennam or Ennam, which, in Punic or Phanician, imports the fountain of pleasure, or the pleasant fountain. The Greeks, having no words ending in M, frequently expunged that letter from Ociental proper names, in order to accommodate them to their own language, of which Maria, Gehemia, Ge. are sufficient instances (11). The authors referred to in the margin evince this etymon (12). The latter fignifies in Punic or Phanician, the mountain of the cave, or the hollow mountain; and that the town of Herbessus stood upon fuch a mountain, appears from several authors (13). We must not omit observing, that the word begins with an H, fince Pliny (14) enumerates the Herbeffenses amongst the inhabitants of those cities, whose names begin with that letter; nor that, in confirmation of what has been advanced, the place at this day is called Le Grotte, or the caverns. From Polyanus we may infer, that the Greeks sometimes pronounced only one of the words of which this town's name was composed, viz. Beffa, or Veffa, which greatly strengthens Bothart's conjecture (15).

(11) Bochart. Chan. l. i. c. 28. (12) Ovid. fast. l. iv. Diod. Sic. l. v. c. 1. Cic. ad Ver. 4. Claud. ii. (13) Bochart. ubi supra. Vide & Polyb. l. i. Diodor. Sic. l. xx. Thucyd. l. iv. c. 6. & Strab. l. vi. 4) Plin. l. iii. c. 8. (15) Cluver. & Fazel. de reb. Sic. Vide & Bochart. ubi sup. ut & Po'yan. l. v. (14) Plin. l. iii. c. 8. c. 1. ex. 4.

a the war, had not an unexpected incident happened, which had like to have proved fatal to the tyrant himself, and thrown the game once more into the hands of the Carthaginians Y.

Lycifcus, an officer of great bravery, being invited by Agathocles to supper, and Amutiny in heated with wine, reflected upon the tyrant's conduct in the most opprobrious terms, Agathocles's uttering at the same time against him the most bitter imprecations. Agathocles camp. uttering at the same time against him the most bitter imprecations. Agathocles, having a personal value for him, on account of his merit, turned all his insolence and scurrility into a jest; but his son Archagathus, highly resenting such infamous behaviour, did not fail to recriminate, and to his invectives not a few menaces were added. When the entertainment was over, and every one retired to his tent, Lycifb cus charged Archagathus with incest, he being suspected of an illicit commerce with Alcia, his father's wife. This intenfed Archagathus to fury and madness; so that losing all moderation, he snatched a lance out of the hands of one of the guard, and immediately piercing Lycifcus with it, laid him dead at his feet. The friends of the deceased, and many other soldiers, enraged at the fact, filled the whole camp by break of day with turnult and consustion. To these many officers, who were justly obnoxious to the tyrant's displeasure for various crimes, thinking this a fair opportunity of delivering themselves from all future apprehensions of punishment, joined in exciting the troops to a revolt. The whole army was foon in motion, and determined to take vengeance either of Archagathus or Agathocles, if he refuled to deliver c up his fon into their hands. The troops therefore, electing new officers to command them, foon possessed themselves of the walls of Tunis, to which place the tyrant returned after the arrival of the last express, and surrounded him, and his son, with their whole body of guards. The Carthaginians, apprised of what had happened, dispatched messengers to the Sicilian forces, promising them larger pay, and ample rewards, if they would abandon the tyrant, and take on in their service. Hereupon Agathocles, seeing himself in the most imminent danger, especially as many of his officers had already closed with the enemy's proposal, and judging it better to fall by the hands of his own foldiers, than to be put to an ignominious death by a cruel and infulting enemy, divested himself of his royal robes, and, in the habit of a poor d pealant, appeared in the midst of his troops. This strange fight so confounded them, that there was a deep filence all over the camp, which Agathocles taking advantage of, made a speech suitable to the occasion, wherein he gave a particular detail of the most memorable events of his past life, and the great actions in which he had been concerned, concluding, that he was determined never to forfeit his honour for the fake of his life, and that therefore he was ready to put a period to his days immediately, if they his fellow-foldiers deemed this expedient for the public good. Upon this he drew his fword, as though his intention was to have killed himself upon the spot; but when in all appearance he was upon the point of thrusting it into his body, the army cried out aloud to him to forbear; and defiring him e to refume his purple robe, and other enligns of royalty, in a moment returned to their duty. This greatly disappointed the Caribaginians, who were in continual expectation of being joined by the most considerable pars at least of the tyrane's army, not dreaming of what was really in agitation at that time in the Sicilian camp. Agathocles therefore surprised a strong body of the enemy, who had posted themfelves close by his troops, that they might be at hand to join them, in case the proposal above-mentioned was listened to; and having put them to the rout, forced them back to their camp with great flaughter. Thus Agathecles not only extricated himfelf out of a strange difficulty, in which his son's imprudence had involved him, but likewise deseated the enemy, when they looked upon his situation as desperate. f However, the ringleaders of the mutiny, and two hundred others, who bere Archa-

But notwithstanding the tyrant's affairs took so happy a turn at this critical jun- Which had a cture, when he seemed to be upon the very brink of destruction, yet the effects of bad effect the late mutiny might, in some nienfere, have been esteemed as fatal to him, fince it "ponhis affairs. gave the Carthaginians an opportunity of recovering from the consternation, into which the deplorable news of the total ruin of their army in Sicily, and the death of their general there, had thrown them. Could Againstles have attacked the Carthaginian forces immediately upon his communication of this advice to them, he would, gathus a grudge, went over in a body to the Carthaginians 2.

7 Idem ibid. Vide & Christ. Hendre in Carthag. 1, ii. fect. 1. p. 168. 2 Dion. Sic. ubi fupra. in all human probability, have easily defeated them, and made himself master of Carthage, had he directly sollowed his blow, without any resistance; but this unfortunate incident gave them time to shake off their panic, and make such preparations for their desence, as, in concurrence with other unforeseen events, bassled all the tyrant's suture efforts to reduce that city. In the mean time he endeavoured to strengthen himself by alliances with the African princes, to whom he sent embassadors, inviting them to join in the common cause, and assist him in overturning that imperious republic, which, with so much haughtiness, lorded it over them. This, together with the same of his victories, had such an effect upon the Numidians, that, immediately declaring in his savour, they renounced all allegiance to the Carthaginians?

A drawn batthe betwixt Agathocles and the Carthaginians.

THE next year the people of Carthage, notwithstanding their deplorable circumstances, sent an army into Numidia, to reduce the revolters; which, in conjunction with the (Q) Zupbons, a nation of that country, brought back many of them to their duty. Agathocles being informed of this, and fearing to lose the benefit of so feafonable a diversion, left his fon Archagathus with part of his forces at Tunis, and with the rest, consisting of eight thousand foot, and eight hundred horse, all chosen men, together with fifty African carriages, for the sake of the greater expedition, advanced to the relief of the Numidians. The Carthaginians, receiving advice of his approach, encamped upon an eminence on the opposite bank of a deep, and seemingly impassable, river, in order to prevent a surprize; from whence they detached a body of light Numidian horse, to obstruct their march, and harass them by continual c To keep these in play, Agathocles sent out parties of his slingers and archers, and with the main body of his army marched directly towards the enemy's camp, where he found them drawn up in battalia ready to receive him. Upon his first attempting to pass the river, he was charged by a body of the Carthaginians with great fury, and lost a considerable number of men; but his troops, notwithstanding the great resistance they met with, at last carried the opposite bank, where they warmly attacked the enemy. Most of the Carthaginian troops were, after an obstinate fight, defeated, and driven into their camp; but a body of Greek auxiliaries, under the command of Clinon, for a confiderable time fustained the shock of the whole Sicilian army, where they did great execution, though at last they thought proper to d retire. Agathocles, not judging it expedient to pursue such resolute sellows, sell upon the Carthaginian camp in two places at once, but, by reason of its being strongly fortified, was vigoroufly repulfed. Notwithstanding this, he continued his efforts to force it, depending greatly upon his Numidian allies; but these, during the heat of the engagement, kept themselves persectly neuter, having an eye chiefly to the plunder of both camps. The action happening near that of the Carthaginians, they durst not move that way, and therefore advanced to the camp of Agathocles, which was at fome distance, and defended but by a small guard. This they plundered, after having put to the fword, or taken prisoners, all that defended it; of which Agathocles being apprised, he hastened thither, and recovered part of the spoil. The Carthaginians, in the mean time, not only preserved themselves by this desection of the Numidians from Agathocles, but put their affairs in Numidia upon the antient foot-

Agathocles gains over Ophellas, prince of the Cyreneans, to his interest.

Though the tyrant had been hitherto the favourite of fortune, yet finding him-felf unable to carry on the war alone, he endeavoured to gain Opbellas, one of Alexander's captains, then possessed of Cyrenaica, over to his interest. In order to this, he sent Orthon, a Syracusian, one of his intimate friends, as embassador to that prince. Opbellas had at this time a considerable army on soot, and was forming a project to inlarge his dominions. Agathocles therefore thought proper to flatter his ambition,

· Idem ibid.

b Idem ibid.

(Q) The Zuphons were a hord or canton of those Numidians, who either always persisted in their side-lity to the Carthaginians, or were the first who returned to their duty. It seems probable, that their capital city, if they had any, must have been named Zuphon, or Zupho, and situate not far from the frontiers of Africa Propria. It is impossible however to determine this fituation with any tolerable degree of precision, especially as none of the antient writers, except Diodorus in this place, if our memory fails us not, have taken any notice of them. Cellarius, though an accurate author, has passed them over in silence (16). ļ.

Ö

c,

Į.

a by promifing him the fovereignty of Africa, if, by his affishance, he would enable him to subdue the Carthaginians. He suggested, that could he get rid of so trouble-fome a rival, he should easily reduce the whole island of Sicily, which would abundantly gratify his ambition; that, had he more extensive views, Italy was near at hand, where he could make farther conquests; that being separated from Africa by a large sea, he had no intention to settle there; and that his last expedition did not proceed from a motive of choice, but necessity. Ophellas was intirely brought over by these suggestions, and, to succour his new ally the more effectually, sent to Athens for a body of troops. As he had married Eurydice, the daughter of Milliades, who commanded the Greeks at the battle of Marathon, and was made free of the city, he obtained his request, the Athenians not doubting but they should share with him and Agathotles all the wealth of the Carthaginians. The low condition to which that people, as well as the other states of Greece, were then reduced by civil dissentions, and the immediate prospect they had of considerable gain, made them exert themselves on this occasion with the greater alacrity.

Opbellas, having finished his military preparations, found his army to consist of And cuts him ten thousand foot, and six hundred horse, all regular troops, besides an hundred off by treachariots, and a body of ten thousand men, attended by their wives and children, as chery. though they had been going to plant a new colony. At the head of these forces he continued his march towards Agathocles for eighteen days, and then encamped at Automolæ (R), a city about three thousand stadia distant from the capital of his dominions. From thence he advanced through the Regio Syrtica, but found himself reduced to such extremities, that his army was in danger of perishing, for want of water, bread, and other provisions. Besides, they were greatly annoyed by serpents and wild beasts, with which that desolate region abounded. The serpents made the greatest havock amongst the troops; for being of the same colour with the earth (S),

and

b Idem ibid. Justin. & Oros. ubi fup.

(R) This city feems to be the Automalax of Ptolemy, which, according to that author, was fortified, and undoubtedly a frontier town of Cyrenaica. Apollodorus and Strabo call it Automala, Diodorus here Automola, and Stephanus Automalaca. It was fituate, according to Strabo, at the bottom of the Greater Syrtis, now called the gulf of Seedra, at a finall distance from the Philanorum ara, the Carthaginian frontier. None of the antients, except Diodorus, have told us how far it was from Cyrena, the capital of Cyrenaica. This last author here gives us to understand, that it stood on the borders of the Regio Syrtica, which agrees with the site assigned it by Ptolemy and Strabo, and that it was three thousand stadia, or about three hundred and seventy-sive miles, from Cyrene; which seems greatly to exceed the truth (17).

to exceed the truth (17).

(S) One remarkable circumstance may be observed in the short description Diodorus here gives us of these serpents, or rather of the mischies arising from thence to Ophellas's army, via. that they were so exactly of the colour of that barren (18) soil, that the soldiers could not diftinguish them from it. This certainly is a strong presumptive proof, that their whole substance must in a manner have consisted of that soil, and consequently that they must have sed intirely upon it. The argument will receive a farther accession of strength from the nature of the region itself, which, Diodorus seems to insinuate, was void of every other kind of sustenance. Further, it may be remarked, that these serpents were of a most malignant species of that animal; fince Diodorus (19) here intimates, that they were extremely venomous, and destroyed a vast number of men; which seems to point particularly at the cherlydras, one of the most noxious species of serpents, subsisting, according to Nicander (20), upon dust, and found, if Cicero and Ælian (21) may be credited, in vast numbers in the desarts of Libya. Bochart has likewise proved by irrefragable (22) arguments, that the faraph, or, according to feveral authors, the serpent in which the devil beguiled Eve, was of this particular species; and that Arabia, as well as the adjacent countries, abounded with them (23); which is also evinced by Herodotus, Mela, Lucan, Solinus, and Ammianus Marcellinus, together with scripture. Let all these particulars be admitted, and the literal sense of a passage in the Mosaic history, which has been hitherto for the most part either allegorically taken, or not fully understood, will be thereby rendered most apparent and incontestable, viz. (24) And the LORD GOD said unto the serpent, Because thou hast done this, thou art cursed above all cattle, and above every beast of the sield: upon thy belly shalt thou go. AND DUST SHALT THOU EAT ALL THE DAYS OF THY LIFE. This (25) feems also to be confirmed in the strongest manner by the prophets Isaiah and Micah. To what has been faid, we may add, if any thing is requisite to be added to so clear a point, that se-veral forts of animals live upon dust, when they can meet with nothing else to eat, as we learn from and extremely venomous, many of the foldiers trod upon them without feeing them, a and were stung to death. At last, after a very fatiguing march of two months, he approached Agathocles, and encamped at a small distance from him, to the great terror of the Carthaginians, who apprehended the most fatal consequences from this junction. Agathocles at first highly careffed him, and advised him to take all possible care of his troops, that had undergone so many fatigues (T); but making no scruple to commit the most enormous crimes, in order to promote his own interest, he resolved upon his destruction. Observing therefore, that one day the greatest part of Ophellas's (U) troops were gone out to forage, he thought a proper opportunity now offered of putting his design in execution. Accordingly he drew up his forces in order of battle, and acquainted them, that Ophellas was guilty of the blackest perfidy, fince, under the pretext of affifting him as an ally, he had formed a scheme to deliver (X) him up to the enemy. Incensed at this, the army fell with great ardor upon Opbellas, who, being at that juncture too weak to oppose them, was killed upon the spot; upon which Agathocles, by fair words, and large promises, prevailed upon the Cyreneans, now destitute of a leader, to serve under him, and be intirely at his devotion. Polyanus relates this event in a different manner from Diodorus; for he tells us, that Agathocles, being informed, that Ophellas was addicted to an unnatural species of lust, decoyed him by means of his son Heraclides, who yet preserved himself inviolate, and put both him, and the greatest part of his army, to the sword.

(17) Ptol. geogr. l. iv. Strab. l. xvii. Diod. Slc. l. xx. c. 2. Apollodor. apud Steph. & Steph. Byzant. de surb. (18) Diod. Sic. in loc. citat. (19) Idem ibid. (20) Nicand. in Theriac. v. 372. Vide & Talmudic. in traft. de fabbat. & Phil. c. 50. (21) Cic. de natur. deor. l. i. Joseph. antiq. l. ii. c. 7. Ælian. de animal. l. ii. c. 38. sub sin. (22) Bochart. in hierozoic. part. post. l. iii. c. 13. p. 422, 423. (23) Herodot. l. ii. & l. iii. c. 109. Mel. l. iii. c. 9. Lucan. l. vi. Solin. c. 32. Ammian. Marcel. l. xxii. Num. c. 21. v. 6. Deut. c. 8. v. 5. (24) Gen. c. 3. ver. 4. Isai. c. 65. v. 25. Mic. c. 7. v. 17. (15) Phil. c. 59. Plaut. in Casm. ast. 1. Bardesan. apud Euseb. de prap. evang. l. vi. Plin. l. x. Porta Cæli, fol. 22. c. Cardan. de variet. l. vii. c. 35.

Vol. VI. Nº 11.

A great revolution like to have happened at Carthage.

WHILST these things were transacting, a great revolution had like to have hap- c pened at Carthage: Bomilcar, then possessed of the first employment in the state, thought this a favourable juncture to obtain the fovereignty of that city, to which he had long aspired. In order to facilitate the execution of this his darling defign, he had fent away all the most eminent citizens, from whom he apprehended any obstruction, to serve in the Numidian expedition. At the head therefore of five hundred of his affociates, supported by a body of a thousand mercenaries, he advanced from Neapolis to Carthage, and entered the city without opposition. As many citizens as he met with, he cut off, without regard to fex or age; which struck the whole city d DIOD. SIC. JUSTIN. & OROS. ubi fup. POLYEN. ftrat. 1. v. c. 3. ex. 4. Vide & Theophrast. de plant. 1. iv. c. 4. PLUT. in Demet. & PAUSAN. in Corinth.

(26) Aristotle, Bardesanes in Eusebius, and others; and that though other serpents feed upon fish, frogs, herbs, &c. the chersydrus, or saraph, lives only in such places as the desarts of Libya, Arabia, &c. where there is scarce a possibility of finding any other food than dust or sand to live upon (27).

(T) Diodorus (28) relates, that upon Ophellas's approaching the Regio Syrsica, he came to a double ridge of mountains, with a valley betwirt them, in which was a cave, wherein queen Lamia, a lady celebrated for her beauty, formerly had her residence. It is pretended, that this lady, being bereaved of all her children, out of an invidious and vindictive principle, caused all those of her subjects to be destroyed. This gave all the neighbouring Africans such a frightful idea of her, that they made use of her name as a bugbear to frighten their children with. Being extremely addicted to drunkenness, according to our author, she never made an inquiry into any of her subjects conduct, but permitted them all to do what they pleased. For this reason she was seigned to be blind, and for her cruelty above-mentioned had the face of a monster affigued her. That the was an African (29), Emipides likewise asserts; we may therefore take further notice of her, when we come to treat of the proper African nations.

(U) According to Diodorus, Polyanus, Theophraflus, and others, this prince's name was Ophelas, or Ophellas; but Justin calls him. Aphellas, and others

Opheleas. With these last Tanaquil Faber agrees, though the reason he assigns for this agreement feems to us not to have any great force in it, viz. because Ophelens is a Lacedamonian name, and consequently more likely than Ophellas to be the name of a Cyrenean, fince the Cyreneans were a colony of the Lacedamonians. Now, this supposes Ophellas to have been a Cyrenean, and that Opheltas was a proper name peculiar to the Lacedamonians; neither of which suppositions can be proved, but are both improbable; since the Lasedamonians had few, if any, names, that we know of, peculiar to themsclves; and Ophellas was one of Alexander's captains, and therefore undoubtedly a native of Greece (30), probably of Macedon.

(X) Justin relates, that Agathocles endeavoured to ingratiate himself with Ophellas, who frequently supped with him, by the most fawning address, and the lowest adulation; that Ophellas adopted the Syracussan tyrant's fon; and that this Cyrenean prince was cut off by treachery, not having taken the pre-caution to guard himself against a surprize. The fame author likewise informs us, that, after this base and infamous action, Agathoeles cajoled the Openess army into his service, and overthrew the Carehaginams in a pitched battle, with incredible flaughter, though at the fame time he himfelt fultained a very considerable loss. This last article however, not agreeing to wall with Diedorus, will hardly engage our affeat to the truth of it (31).

<sup>(26)</sup> Aristot. de animal. l. viii. c. 5. Pisid. in hexaem. & Bochart. in hierozoic. part. prim. l, i. c. 4. p. 27. (27) Bochart. hierozoic. part. post. l. iii. c. 13. p. 422, 423. (28) Diod. Sic. in loc. cirat. (29) Eurip. apud Diod. Sic. ibid. (30) Pluo. in Demet. Pausan. in Corinth: Theophrast. de plant. l. iv. c. 4. Polyan. strat. l. iii. c. 3. ex. 4. Fussin. l. xx. c. 7. Vide etiam Bongarsium, & Tan. Fab. in Justin. loc. cirat. (31) Conf. Justin. ubi sup. cum Diod. Sic. l. xx. c. 2, 3.

a with incredible terror, every one imagining, that the town was betrayed to the enemy. Dividing his forces into five bodies, he made five different attacks, carrying every thing before him, till at last his troops all met in the forum. However, when it was known, that Bomilear had been the occasion of this disturbance, and had moreover caused himself to be proclaimed king of Carthage, the young men took up arms to repel the tyrant, and, from the tops of the houses, discharged whole vollies of darts and stones upon the heads of his foldiers. The traytor, finding himfelf not able to carry the city, forced his way through the defiles, and retired to Neapolis; but being closely pursued by the Carthaginians, who by this time had affembled a fufficient force, he retired with his troops to an eminence, there intending b to make a vigorous defence, and fell his life at as dear a rate as possible. To spare the blood of the citizens, a general amnesty was proclaimed for all who would lay down their arms. The rebels surrendered upon this proclamation, and all enjoyed the benefit of it, except Bomilear their chief; but he, notwithstanding the general indemnity promifed on oath, was condemned to die, and fixed to a cross in the middle of the forum, where he suffered the most exquisite torments. From the cross, as from the rostra, he harangued the people, reproaching them for their injustice, their ingratitude, and perfidy, which he demonstrated in an historical deduction of many illustrious generals, whose services they had rewarded with an ignominious death. Having thus infulted both his tortures and the authors of them, he expired, c by his death delivering the Carthaginians from the most dangerous domestic enemy their state had ever produced o.

It is worthy observation, that Agathocles caused Ophellas to be murdered, and Bomilear made the last stagrant attempt upon the liberties of his country, at the same instant of time, though neither of them was privy to the other's design. Had Agathocles been apprised of Bomilear's ambition, or of the disorder and confusion then in the town of Carthage, he might easily have made himself master of it; for if the latter could have been supported by the former in the critical moment, he would undoubtedly have joined him, in order to avoid falling a victim to the fury of his enraged fellow-citizens. On the other hand, had the Carthaginians entertained any d suspicion of Ophellas's impending danger, by joining him, or at least sending him a strong reinforcement, they might, without much difficulty, have overthrown Agathocles, as in some measure appeared from the suture course of this war; but the generals on both fides being chiefly intent on gratifying their own ambition, which they at that time imagined incompatible with the public welfare, their armies were content not to observe one another's motions, and by this means undefignedly contributed to each other's preservation.

Agathocles, now finding himself at the head of a numerous army, in imitation of Agathocles Alexander's captains, who took upon them the dignity of crowned heads, affumed affumes the title of king of the title of king of Africa, intending foon to complete his conquests in that country, Africa, and by the reduction of Carthage. However, for the present, his arms received a const-takes Utica by e derable diversion from the Uticans; which prevented him from putting his design in sorm. execution. Having received intelligence of their revolt, he advanced with such expedition to their city, that he surprised three hundred of them in the adjacent fields, and made them all prisoners. These he placed alive in a warlike engine, which he brought to the walls of the town, and exposed them in such a manner to the darts and arrows of the besieged, that they could not repel his affaults, without destroying their own citizens, among whom were fome of the prime nobility. He then fummoned the garrifon to furrender, imagining they would be induced to this by the fight of their friends and relations; but finding they valued their liberty more than these, he began the siege, and discharged such vollies of stones and missive weapons I from the engine above-mentioned, that the besieged were thrown into a great consternation. At first they refused to defend themselves for sear of destroying their countrymen; but finding the enemy to push on the siege with incredible fury, and that without a vigorous relistance they must soon fall into their hands, they betook themselves to their arms, and in several assaults bravely repulsed them. At last Agathocles, summoning all his courage, made a general affault upon the weakest part of the wall, and carried it; notwithstanding which the Uticans for some time kept their posts; but the tyrant's whole army forcing itself like a torrent into the town, and foon at the following driving them, partly into the temples, and partly into their own houses, they were a all either put to the fword, or taken prisoners f.

As likewise Hippo Diarrbytus.

THE tyrant, having hanged all the prisoners, plundered the town, and lest a fufficient garrison in it, marched with his army to Hippouacra, or Hippo Diarrbytus. the Bizerta of the moderns, a place naturally fortified by the lake upon which it Before he could reduce this city, he was obliged to engage the inhabitants upon the water with his galleys; but having defeated them on that element, and followed his attacks closely for some days, he at last took it by storm. Most of the people bordering upon the sea-coasts, and even those inhabiting the inland part of the country, after this submitted to him. The Numidians he found himself not able to subdue; however, many of their hords or cantons thought proper to conclude a b treaty of peace with him 8.

Xenodochus mophilus and Leptines.

In the mean time Xenodochus, general of the Agrigentines, having restored many of defeated by De- the cities in Sicily to the full enjoyment of their rights and privileges, the subjects both of the Carthaginians and Syracusians entertained hopes of a revolution throughout the island in favour of liberty. Animated by these hopes, great numbers of them took up arms, and entered into an affociation, in order to extirpate tyranny. Agathocles, receiving advice of this from Demophilus and Leptines, the commanders of his troops in Sicily, was (Y) greatly alarmed, and therefore resolved to return home; which, he thought, he might safely do for a while, as his affairs on the continent Agathocles re- were in a very flourishing condition. Having therefore built some open vessels, with c turns to Sicily. fifty oars a-piece, and put two thousand men on board, he set fail for Sicily, leaving his fon Archagathus governor of the conquests in Africa, and commander in chief of the forces there. Upon his arrival at Selinus, he found, that Demopbilus and Leptines had not only affembled a powerful army, but likewise deseated Xenodochus in a pitched battle, and forced him to fly to Agrigentum, with the loss of fifteen hundred men. After this victory, Agathocles advanced to Therma, a city possessed by a Carthagiman garrison; which immediately submitted to him. Cepbalædium, Heraclea, and other places, that had regained their liberty, he likewise reduced; but could not make himself master of the principal cities belonging to the Carthaginians h.

Archagathus meets with great success in Africa.

Archagathus, after his father's departure, greatly extended the conquests in Africa. d He sent Eumachus, at the head of a large detachment, to invade some of the neighbouring provinces, whilst he himself, with the gross of his army, observed the motions of the Carthaginians. Eumachus, falling into Numidia, first took the great city of Tocas, and conquered several of the Numidian cantons, that would not come into a state of amity with Agathocles. Afterwards he laid siege to Phellina, and carried it; which was attended with the submission of the Asphodelodians, a nation, according to Diodorus, as black as the Etbiopians. From hence he marched to Maschala, a city of great importance, built by the Greeks in their return from Troy, and inhabited by their posterity for several succeeding ages, which opened its gates to him. Then he moved to Hipponacra, which, fince its furrender to Agathocles, had revolted to the e enemy, and made himself master of it. Lastly, he possessed himself of Acris (Z), a f Diop. Sic. ubi fup. 8 Idem ibid.

(Y) Juffin offirms, that not Xenodochus, but the Carthagimans, obliged Agathocles to return to Sicily; and that the latter, after the death of Hamilear, the fon of Gisco above-mentioned, sent another army to that island; nay, he farther seems to hint, that they had laid fiege to that metropolis, before Agathoeles's arrival there; and that this was the immediate cause of the tyrant's abandoning Africa in so precipitate a manner. But as this fragment of history is not taken the least notice of by Diodorus, and even in-consistent with what Justin had himself before re-lated, we are not disposed to give over-much credit to it (32).

The same author likewise tells us, that Agathoeles, after his arrival in Sieily, expelled the Chriha-ginians from thence, and made himself master of the whole island. But as this directly contradicts Diodorus Siculus, we have not thought proper to infert it in the body of the history : 33).

(Z) Neither the city of Tocas, nor those of Phelh Idem ibid. & Justin. ubi sup. c. 8.

lina, Maschala, Acris, nor yet the nation of the Asphodelodians, though, according to our author, a very remarkable people, have been mentioned by Cellarius, whose work is yet held in the highest repute. They all seem to have had their situation in that part of Numidia contiguous to Africa Propria, and not far from Hippo Diarrhyius. It is probable those auxiliary troops taken prisoners by Gelon in his engagement with the Carthaginians, which Frontinus calls Nigerrimi, were of this nation, the Melanogatuli, and even of the Nigrita themselves; for that they all were not only known to, but likewise had an intercourse with, the Carthaginians, cannot well be doubted. As not only the cities above-mentioned, but a vast number of others, taken notice of by Heredotus, Diedorus, Pausanias, Appian, &cc. have been omitted by Cellarius, it were to be wished some learned man would give us a new edition of that author, which he might eafily do, with very large additions (34).

(32) Justin. l. xxii. c. 8. sub init.
(33) Conf. Just. ubi sup, cum Diod. Sic. l. xx. c. 2, 3.
(34) Diod. Sic. in loc. citat. c. 3. S. Jul. Frontin. strat. l. i. c. 11. ex. 18.

a free city, of great opulence, which he gave up to the foldiers to be plundered, and fold the inhabitants for flaves; after which he returned to the camp, loaden with the immense booty he had got in this successful expedition i.

ELATED with such a run of good fortune, Eumachus resolved next to penetrate HisgeneralEuinto the more remote parts of Africa on the fide of Numidia; in order to which, machus penehaving traversed the countries invaded last, and continuing his march, he arrived at more remote a city called Milline, and, at the first attempt, forced his way into it. But notwith-parts of Africa; standing this first instance of success, the barbarians, immediately collecting their but is soon obwhole torce, attacked him in the streets with such sury, that they obliged him to liged to retire retire out of the town in great confusion, after he had lost a vast number of men. tion.

b From hence he advanced to a high mountain, above two hundred stadia over, full of wild cats, but destitute of all kinds of birds, on account of the rapaciousness of those animals. Having passed this mountain with great difficulty, he came to three cities, called in the Greek language Pithecusa, from the apes (A), with which all the adjacent country abounded. One of these he took by assault, and levelled it with the ground; which so terrified the other two, that they immediately surrendered; but receiving intelligence, that all the neighbouring nations were marching in a formidable body to give him battle, he abandoned his conquests, and retreated with the utmost precipitation towards the sea-coasts k.

e expedition of Eumachus occasioned a very considerable alteration in the face of affairs. thus and the The Carthaginians, being informed of that general's ill success, took courage, and Carthaginians. refolved to exert themselves in an extraordinary manner to recover their former losses. In order to this, they divided their forces into three bodies: one of these they sent to the sea-coasts, to keep the towns there in awe; another they dispatched into the Mediterranean parts, to preserve the inhabitants there in their allegiance; and the last body they ordered to the Upper Africa, to support their confederates in that country. They had other motives likewise for this conduct: by sending such a number of mouths out of the city, they supposed they should, in some measure, restore plenty to the citizens, who began to be in want of provisions: the city was fo d strongly fortified, and lay so near the sea, that it was in no danger of being taken by force; and therefore all superfluous hands were rather troublesome than useful: by fending a powerful army to the relief of their allies, they believed they should not only confirm them in their fidelity, and prevent their joining the enemy, but likewife encourage the neighbouring neutral princes to declare in their favour; and lastly, they had reason to imagine, that, by such a various diversion, they should draw the enemy's forces at a greater distance from the city, and consequently give themselves a little time to breath. They were not deceived in their views; for upon the departure of thirty thousand soldiers out of the city, provisions returned to their former price; their confederates abandoned the side, through compulsion they had been e obliged to take; and the enemy were forced to draw their troops off from the neigh-

HITHERTO Archagathus had been the favourite of fortune; but this last unhappy The dispositions

k Drop. Sic. ubi fup. DIOD. Sic. ubi sup. c. 3. Justin. l. xxii.

bourhood of Carthage. Archagathus, being apprised of the motions of the Carthaginians, divided his forces likewife into three bodies: one of these he sent to observe the Carthaginian troops on the sea-coasts, with orders afterwards to advance into the Upper Africa; another, under the command of Eschrion, one of his generals, he polled at a proper distance in the heart of the country, to have an eye both upon the

(A) Diodorus tells us, that the inhabitants of this tract had customs far different from those of the Greeks; that the apes here mentioned were very familiar with them, had admission into their houses, and received divine honours from them, in the same manner that dogs did from the Egyptians. He adds, that when these creatures were hungry, they took meat out of the cellars, butteries, &c. without any disturbance; that parents named their children after them, as the Greeks did after the gods; that whoever killed one of them, was fure to fuffer death, as a notorious atheift; and that for this reason, when any person behaved himself amongst them with unufual haughtiness and insolence, it was a prover-bial expression. Then hast drunk the blood of an ape. This proverb Erasmus applies to those who die a violent death. Two things may be inferred from Diodorus's relation: first, that the Africans gave these apes names, probably terms of honour and distinction, fuch as the Egyptians, and other nations. conferred upon their gods; and fecondly, that the Greeks applied the names of their gods to themselves, particularly, as there is reason to believe, to their kings and heroes, as the Assyrians, Babylonians, Egyptians, &c. did. We shall treat more amply of this people, and their customs, in a proper place (35).

(35) Diod. Sic. ubi sup. Erasm. in adag. p. 492;

enemy there, and the barbarous nations; and with the last, which he led in person, a he kept nearer Carthage, preserving a communication with the other two, in order to fend them succours, or recal them, as the exigency of affairs should require. Things being in this situation, Archagathus kept himself quiet in his camp, well pleased with the dispositions he had made, and with great impatience expecting the event!

The Syracufians defeated by the Carthaginians.

THE Carthaginian troops fent into the heart of the country were commanded by Hanno, a general of great experience, who, being informed of Æschrion's approach that way, laid an ambuscade for him, into which being drawn, he was cut off him-felf, with four thousand foot, and two hundred horse. The rest were either taken prisoners, or fled to Archagathus, who lay encamped about five hundred stadia from the place where this action happened. Himileo, who commanded the Carthaginian b forces in the Upper Africa, having advice of Eumachus's march, immediately put himself in motion, and at last took post in a town near that general's camp, with a resolution to engage him. The Greeks, tho' much incommoded by the spoils taken out of several cities, which they carried with them, drew up their army in battalia, and prepared to attack the enemy. Himilco left part of his army in the town, with orders to fally out upon the Greeks as foon as they faw them pursue him. Advancing then at the head of his other forces, he fell upon them with great fury; but soon after his men betook themselves to a precipitate flight, as the they were in the utmost consternation. Eumachus, puffed up with this supposed advantage, permitted his troops to purfue them with fo much eagerness, that they fell into disorder; which being c observed by the forces in the place, they rushed out in an instant upon them, and at the same time the other body facing about, the Greeks were so disheartened, that they endeavoured to retire to their camp; but finding their retreat cut off by the body that iffued out of the town, they fled to a neighbouring eminence. Here being furrounded by the Carthaginians, and in great want of water, they were almost totally destroyed; for of eight thousand foot only thirty, and of eight hundred horse only forty, had the good fortune to escape, the rest either perishing of thirst, or being put to the sword m.

Agathocles, mpon receiving this bad news, leaves Sicily.

Archagathus, receiving the melancholy advice of these two defeats, and being rejoined by the remains of Æschrion's army, ordered the detachments he had sent out to harass the enemy, to return with all speed to the camp. This was a very necessary pre- d caution; for, after the defeat of Eumachus, Himilco moved with great expedition towards Archagathus, blocking up the passes, and securing the country, all along as he advanced, from the enemy's incursions; so that had not the above-mentioned detachments retired in time, pursuant to the order received, they must undoubtedly have been all cut to pieces. Himilco therefore cutting off all communication betwixt the Syracufian army and the fruitful country of Africa on one fide, and Atarbas, another Carthoginian commander, who lay encamped within forty stadia of Tunis, preventing any supplies coming to them by sea on the other, the Greeks in a short time were reduced to the last extremity for want of provisions. Many of their confederates, being struck with terror at so dismal a prospect, deserted them, and went e over to the enemy, who now hemmed them in on all fides, and feemed ready to swallow them up every moment. Whilft things remained in this melancholy situation, Agathocles received an express from Archagathus, acquainting him with the great losses he had fustained, and the extreme scarcity of provisions the troops laboured under. Upon which Agathocles, leaving the management of the war in Sicily to Leptines, by a stratagem got eighteen sail of Etruscan ships, that came to his affistance, out of the harbour of Syracuse; and then engaging the Carthaginian squadron lying off of that harbour, took five of their ships, and made all the men therein prisoners. By this action he became master of the port, and secured the passage into it for the merchants of all nations; which foon produced a plenty of all things in f Syracuse, where famine before began to make great havock. Supplying himself therefore with a fufficient quantity of necessaries for the voyage he was going to undertake, he immediately loosed from Syracuse, and set sail for Africa ".

Upon his arrival here, he took a review of his forces (B), and found them to n Diod. Sic. ubi sup.

1 Idem ibid. m Idem ibid.

(B) Justin relates, that Agathocles, upon his arrival in Africa, found a mutiny in the army, which arose from a want of payment of the arrears due to the troops. In order to bring them back to their duty, he made them a florid speech, wherein he told them, That they ought to seek their pay from the enemy; that as they would all of them have a hand in obtaining the victory, so they should all par-

tal=

a confift of fix thousand Greeks, as many Celtes, Samnites, and Etruscans (C), besides ten thousand Africans, who had persevered in their fidelity to him, notwithstanding the difasters that had befallen him, and fifteen hundred horse. As he found his troops reduced almost to a state of desperation, and consequently prepared for any attempt, he thought this a proper juncture to offer the enemy battle; which he did accord- And, upon his The Cartbaginians, though they had the advantage of numbers, having col- arrival in lected all their forces into one body, and were encamped upon an eminence that was Africa, offers almost inaccessible, thought proper to decline the challenge, not being willing to bastle. put all to the issue of a battle with men who were grown desperate, but believing, that by lying still in their camp, where they had plenty of every thing, and prob tracting the time, they could starve the enemy to a surrender, and consequently make themselves masters of their camp without striking a stroke of Agathocles, perceiving the enemy's design, and finding he could not long continue He attacks the in that camp, refolved at all events to force them to a battle. Moving therefore at Carthaginian the head of his forces to their camp, he attacked it with fuch bravery, that he made camp, but is a considerable impression upon it, and might possibly have carried it, had not his feated. mercenaries basely deserted him, and taken to their heels almost upon the first onset. The Cartbaginians, as much animated by this cowardice as the Greeks were difmayed, redoubling their efforts, soon forced the tyrant to retreat with great precipitation to his camp; whither they purfued him very closely, doing great execution in the purc suit. The Carthaginians spared the Africans in this action, in order to win the affections of that people; but bearing an implacable hatred to the Greeks, besides the prisoners they took, they put above three thousand of them to the sword P.

THE next night the Carthaginians facrificed all the prisoners of distinction, as a Adjuster hapgrateful acknowledgment to the gods for the victory they had given them. Whilst pens in the Carthey were in the midst of this solemnity, the wind, suddenly rising, carried the slames samp. to the facred tabernacle, near the altar, which they intirely confumed, as well as the general's tent, and those of the principal officers adjoining to it. This occasioned a dreadful alarm throughout the whole camp, which was heightened by the great progress the fire made; for the soldiers tents consisting of very combustible materials, d and the wind blowing in a most violent manner, the whole camp was almost intirely laid in ashes; and many of the soldiers, endeavouring to carry off their arms, and the rich baggage of their officers, were burnt to death. Some of those who made their escape out of the flames, met with as unhappy a fate; for after Agathocles had received the last blow, the Africans, as in all reverses of fortune that people closed with the strongest side, deserted him, and were at that very instant coming over in a body to the Carthaginians. These the persons above-mentioned took to be the whole Syracusian army advancing in order of battle to attack their camp; which being foon noised through the Carthaginian army, a dreadful confusion ensued: fome betook themselves to their heels; others fell down in heaps one upon another, imae gining the enemy was at that instant coming upon them; and lastly, others engaged their comrades, mistaking them for the enemy. In fine, five thousand men lost their lives in this nocturnal encounter, and the rest thought proper to shelter themselves within the walls of Carthage; neither could the appearance of the day itself, for some time, diffipate those terrible apprehensions they were under 9. AT the same time an accident, something resembling this, happened in the Greek And another in The African deserters, observing the great confusion the Carthaginians were that of Again, and not understanding the meaning of it, were so terrified, that they thought thocles. proper to return to the place from whence they came. The Syracusians, seeing a · Idem ibid. & Justin. 1. xxii. c. 8.

1

10 1

10

ıŁ

P Drop. Sic. ubi sup. q Idem ibid.

take of the spoil; that if they would but exert themselves vigorously for a short time, the war might be brought to a happy conclusion, and Catthage reduced; in which case there would be riches enough to satisfy their most avaricious desires. The same author adds, that by this speech having appealed all commotions, and calmed the minds of the foldiery, he soon after gave the enemy battle; but being defeated, the troops again grew very clamorous for their pay; which, together with the bad state of his affairs, obliged him, and his fon Archagashus, by night to abandon Africa (36).

(C) From this passage, as well as from many more that might be produced, it appears, that the Etruscans at this time made some figure by sea; and that they, as well as many other nations of Italy, were afraid of the Carthaginian power, which induced them frequently to affift the Greeks of Sicily against that nation, both by sea and land.

(26) Justin, l. xxii.c. 8.

body

body of troops advancing towards them in good order, immediately concluded, that a the enemy were marching to attack them, and therefore in an inftant cried out, To arms. The flames afcending out of the Carthaginian camp into the air, and the lamentable outcries proceeding from thence, confirmed them in this opinion, and greatly contributed towards heightening their confusion. The consequence of this panic was much the same with that above-mentioned; for coming to blows one with another instead of the enemy, they scarce recovered their senses upon the return of This intestine fray was so bloody, that it cost Agathocles four thousand the light.

U'ho foon after abandons Africa.

THE last disaster, though of no advantage to the enemy, who had themselves fuffered more than the Syracusians on the like occasion, quite disheartened Agathocles. b His mind being now filled with melancholy reflections, he confidered himself as deserted by the Africans; as not having a sufficient number of troops to contend with the Carthaginians; and lastly, as in danger of being assassinated by his own son, and therefore resolved to quit Africa. As he knew the Carthaginians were masters at sea, and was perfuaded they would never make peace with him upon any terms confiftent with his fafety, but take ample vengeance of him for the ravages he had made in their country, he concluded, it would be impossible for him to escape in a public manner, and therefore fet his head to work to find out fome method of flipping away privately. This he at last, though with great difficulty, effected. But as the manner of his escape, which more properly appertains to the history of Sicily, than that c of Carthage, has been already related by us at large, we must refer our readers for farther fatisfaction on this head to a former part of this history'.

Agathocles's troops out off his two fons,

AFTER Agathocles's departure, his two fons fell a facrifice to the wild fury (D) of the foldiers, who immediately put them to death; and chusing leaders from amongst and conclude a themselves, concluded a peace with the Carthaginians upon the following terms: peace with the First, that the Greeks should deliver up all the places they held in Africa, receiving Carthaginians. from them three hundred talents. Secondly, that fuch of them as were willing to ferve under the Carthaginians, should be kindly treated, and receive the usual pay. And thirdly, that the rest should be transported to Sicily, and have the city of Selinus for their habitation. These articles were agreed to, and punctually observed by d the Carthaginians; in confequence of which, all those troops that adhered to the treaty they had concluded, met with a most kind reception; but the cities, which, in hopes of relief from Agathocles, refused to submit, were reduced by force of arms, their governors crucified, and the garrisons obliged to cultivate those parts of the country they had before laid waste and destroyed. Thus this war, after various turns and revolutions, ended to the advantage of the Carthaginians, who, by the last treaty, fettled their affairs upon the antient footing, notwithstanding the great losses they had fustained, and notwithstanding the Syracusian army had brought them to the very brink of destruction '.

Our historian here finely observes, that several most remarkable traces of a divine e Providence appeared through the whole course, and at the conclusion, of this war: Agathocles was routed in Sicily by the Carthaginians, and lost the greatest part of his army; his affairs there were almost desperate, and his capital city upon the point of furrendering to the enemy: notwithstanding which, with a very inconsiderable body of men, he, at this perillous juncture, invaded Africa, defeated the Carthaginians, and reduced them almost to the same unhappy circumstances his own troops laboured under at Syracuse. In Sicily he lost every thing, but his metropolis, which the enemy thought themselves sure of; but in Africa he possessed himself of all places, except Carthage, which, for some time, he closely besieged. By which remarkable steps, DIOD. Sic. & Justin. ubi fup. Vide & Univers. Hist. vol. iii. p. 86. Sic. l. xx. c. 3. Just. l. xxii. c. 8. fub fin. Univers. Hist. vol. iii. p. 86, 87, 88, &c.

(D) Justin says, that the Syracusian troops, being apprised of Agathocles's flight, were in as great a consternation, as if they had all been actually surprised by the enemy; that Archagathus, being separated by the second sec rated from his father, and losing his way by the darkness of the night, was taken by a Sicilian party. and carried to the camp; that he was put to death by Arceflans, one of his father's intimate friends; and that, before the fatal stroke was given, Archagathus asked him, How he thought Agathocles would treat the children of Arcestlans, who be-reaved him of his children? To whom the other replied, that it was enough for him, that his children survived those of Agathocles. In other points, this author almost intircty agrees with Diodorus Siculus (37).

1

o:ha th

a Providence made it apparent, that it is equally easy for the Supreme Being in a moment to elevate the most afflicted states, and depress the most powerful. After the tyrant, in the height of his prosperity, had murdered Ophellas, in violation of all the laws of friendship and hospitality, Providence distinguished itself likewise in a most extraordinary manner: his affairs in Africa from that instant began to decline; the very month, and day of the month, on which he treacherously murdered Ophellas, and brought over his army, he lost both his sons and his army; and lastly, as he had most perfidiously assassinated his friend, the very troops this friend commanded, afterwards cut off his two fons. As Diodorus made these observations for the sake of those persons, who are too apt to slight, or not duly attend to, such uncommon b instances of an over-ruling power, we thought we could not properly omit them ".

Notwithstanding peace was concluded betwirt the Syracusian troops in Africa Which is ratiand the Carthaginians, yet the treaty was not ratified by Agathocles till the year fol-field by Agatholowing. That prince, being reduced to great streights by Dinocrates, who began cles. to aspire to the sovereignty of Syracuse, found it necessary to court the friendship of the Carthaginians. This obliged him to purchase a peace with them at a very dear rate; for he not only ratified the former treaty, but confented to have an additional article inferted in it much to the advantage of the Carthaginians, viz. that all the cities they formerly possessed in Sicily should be restored to them; which being immediately executed, the Carthaginians left him at liberty to pursue his designs in Sicily; c and, to facilitate the accomplishment of them, sent him three hundred, or, as Timaus Siculus will have it, an hundred and fifty, talents of gold, besides two hundred thou-fand medimni, or five hundred thousand bushels, of wheat w.

Agathocles, having defeated Dinocrates, and re-established his affairs at Syracuse, Agathocles passed over into Italy, where he subdued the Brutii, rather by the terror of his name, meditates anthan by force of arms. From hence he passed over to the Lipari islands, in order carthage to raise contributions; which he did to the value of an hundred talents of gold, plundered the facred treasure, stripped the temples, and then set sail for Syracuse, with eleven ships laden with the gold and spoils of the temples. Diodorus seems to intimate, that Sicily, for a confiderable time after this, enjoyed the sweets of peace, but d that at last the implacable hatred Agathocles bore the Carthaginians prevailed upon him to make preparations for a new war with that nation. As the Carthaginians, by the last war, had made themselves masters of the sea, they were abundantly supplied with all the necessaries and elegancies of life, and easily secured their country from all foreign invasions. Agathocles therefore fitted out a squadron of two hundred galleys, in order first to prevent the exportation of corn and other provisions from Sicily and Sardinia to Africa, and afterwards to transport a large body of forces into that country, to attempt a second time the conquest of it. But this, as well as the other projects he had formed, fell to the ground by his death, an account of which And dies.

we have already given in the history of Syracuse x.

After the death of Agathocles, Manon, who had poisoned him, usurped the The Syracusifupreme authority at Syracuse. This he did by murdering Archagathus, and bring- ans, being ing over the army to his interest. The Syracustans however resolved to have a struggle by civil dissenfor their liberty, and therefore raised another army, giving the command of it to sions, and in-Icetas, with orders to attack Manon. In the mean time Manon, finding himself vaded by the not firong enough to engage Icetas, industriously avoided fighting, and applied to Carthaginians, the Carthaginians for affiliance. That people always intent upon fomenting divisional Pyrrhus, the Carthaginians for affiltance. That people, always intent upon fomenting divi-king of Epirus, fions in Sicily, in order to inlarge their own acquisitions there, readily granted his to their affitrequest; and joining him with a strong body of troops, obliged the Syracusians to ance. conclude a peace with them upon their own terms, to recal the exiles, and, as a f security for their punctual observation of the treaty, to deliver them four hundred hostages. Soon after, Icetas seized upon the government at Syracuse, and ruled there with an absolute sway, though he declined the title of king, contenting himself with that of prætor. In the mean time the rebels and Syracufian exiles, in conjunction with the Agrigentines, who, in the ninth year of his command, revolted from him, advanced, under the conduct of Phintias, to Hybla, where they were attacked and defeated by Icetas. That general, greatly puffed up with this victory, engaged the Carthaginian army upon the banks of the river Teria, but was overthrown with DIOD. Sic. ubi fup. a Diod. Sic. ubi sup. w Diod. Sic. ubi sup. c. 4. 2 L l. xxi. in excerptis Rhodomani. ÆLIAN. var. hist. l. ii. Oros. l. vii. c. 6. .2 Univ. hist. ubi sup. Diod. Sic.

Vol. VI. Nº 11.

incredible

incredible flaughter, and forced to fly to Syracuse. In Icetas's absence, one Thynion a had possessed himself of the sovereign power there; but being opposed by Sosistratus. who had the same aim, a civil war broke out within the very walls of the city. Thynion maintained himself in the island with a body of ten thousand men, and his rival held the other quarters of the city with the like number of forces; fo that for some time Syracuse was nothing but a scene of blood and slaughter. The Carthaginians, taking advantage of these divisions, reduced most of the cities subject to Syracuse, and invested the capital itself with a fleet of an hundred sail, and an army of fifty thousand men. Thynion and Sosistratus, finding the Carthaginians to push on the fiege with fuch vigour, that, in all probability, they would foon make themselves masters of the city, unless speedily relieved, united their forces against the common enemy, and dispatched messengers to Pyrrhus, then at Tarentum, intreating him to b come over to Sicily, and deliver the Greeks there from the barbarians, who threatened them with utter destruction. That prince received these messengers very favourably, and, fending Cyneas (E) before-hand to conclude a treaty with Thynion and Sosistratus, after having left a strong garrison in Tarentum, under the conduct of Milo, embarqued with his army for Sicily. He took with him a confiderable number of elephants, and a vast quantity of provisions, and the tenth day after he had loosed from Tarentum, arrived at Locri; from whence steering his course for Italy, he in a few days landed at Taurominium, and, upon his arrival, was joined by Tyndarion, tyrant of that city. With this reinforcement he advanced to Catana, and from thence marched to Syracuse, at the head of thirty thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse, c all his own troops, befides the Sicilian auxiliaries that joined him, attended by a fleet of two hundred fail. The Carthaginians, then carrying on the siege of Syracuse, having detached thirty of their best vessels to bring in a fresh supply of provisions, did not think themselves strong enough to venture an engagement with Pyrrbus's fleet, and therefore judged it not proper to wait his approach; so that he entered Syracuse without opposition. Soon after he had possessed himself of that important place, embassadors arrived from the Leontini, who had joined with Thynion and Sosistratus in pressing the king of Estrus to come and take upon him the defence of their respective states, offering to deliver up their city into his hands, and to join his forces with a body of four thousand foot, and five hundred horse. Many other cities d followed the example of Syracure and Leontium. In short, Pyrrbus, partly by the terror of his name, and partly by his infinuating and affable behaviour, made fuch an impression upon the minds of the Sicilians in general, that he doubted not soon having them all intirely at his devotion, and confequently flattered himself with the hopes of speedily divesting the Carthaginians of all their acquisitions in Sicily v.

The Carthagiquence of a the Romans decline accepting of. They afterwards offer their mediation for accommodating all di serences between the two powers.

WE must not omit observing, that before Pyrrbus landed in Italy, the Romans Romans affig. were not unacquainted with the designs of that ambitious prince. In order therefore ance, when at- to strengthen themselves against any attempts he might make, or at least to deter him tacked by Pyr- from making any such attempts, they renewed their treaties with the Carthaginians, who, on their fide, likewise were under some apprehensions of his invading Sicily. c To the articles of the preceding treaties one was added, which contained an engagetreaty just con- To the articles of the preceding treaties one was added, where the contracting powers should be attacked cluded between ment of mutual affishance, in case either of the contracting powers should be attacked therein that the Carthaginians should by Pyrrbus. As it was particularly specified therein, that the Carthaginians should fend a sufficient naval force to the relief of the Romans, upon the first notice of a rupture with the king of Epirus, as foon as they heard he had made a descent in Italy, they ordered for that purpose a fleet (F) of an hundred and twenty sail, under the

> r Diod. Sic. ubi sup. & l. xxii. apud Laur. Rhodoman. Plot. in Pyrrh. Pausan. l. i. Justin. l. xviii. DIONYS. HALICAR. ant. Rom. l. xii. in excerptis Valefii,

(E) Cyneas was a famous orator, and a hearer of Demosthenes. According to Plutareh. Pyrrhus looked upon himself as more obliged to Cyneas's eloquence for many of his conquests, than to the force of his arms. The author last-mentioned calls him Cineas; but we chuse rather to follow Justin, who calls him Cyneas. Paufanias countenances us herein; for he takes notice of one Philabrus, an Eretrian traitor, the fon of Cyneas. This, together with the word kurn an helmer, from whence the proper name itfelf is apparently derived, feems to put the point beyond dispute. Tanaquil Faber himself was of our opinion (37).

(F) Valerius Maximus, in the place cited, makes this squadron to have consisted of an hundred and thirty sail. Possibly the particular number of ships, with which the Carthaginians were to assist the Romans, might be specified in a subsequent treaty, fince the epiromizer of Livy mentions a fourth treats concluded between the two republics after the battle of Asculum (38).

(37) Plut. in Pyrrh. c. 28. Liv. l. xxxiv. Passfan. Achaic. p. 415. Bern. & Tan. Fab. in Just. l. xviii. c. 2. (38) Val. Max. in loc. citat. Liv. epit. l. xiii.

command

a command of Mago. That officer, in an audience he had of the senate, upon his arrival at Rome, told the conscript fathers, that his principals had heard with great concern of the hostilities Pyrrbus committed in Italy; adding, that he was sent by his republic to offer them a foreign force, to enable them to repel this foreign invader. The fenate, after receiving him with proper marks of distinction, returned thanks for this obliging offer of the Carthaginians, but at the same time thought proper to decline accepting it. Diodorus tells us, that, notwithstanding this, the Carthaginian fleet, having a body of land forces on board, failed to Rhegium; which place they battered for some time with incredible sury, but were at last obliged to raise the siege. They destroyed, according to this author, a vast quantity of timber, and b other materials for shipping, in that port, and then put to sea with their squadron, to observe the motions of Pyrrbus. Mago, some days after his departure from Rome, repaired to Pyrrbus's camp, under pretence of offering the mediation of Cartbage for accommodating all differences betwixt him and the Romans, but in reality to found him, and discover, if possible, his designs with regard to Sicily, which common same reported he was going to invade. The Carthaginians at that time were assaid, lest either Pyrrbus, or the Romans, should concern themselves with the affairs of that island, and transport forces thither for the conquest of it. And indeed this seems to have been the real motive for their fending a fleet to affift the Romans, rather than a defire to be punctual in the observance of their engagements, which they were never c famous for, this being inconfistent with that subtle and intriguing genius, which discovered itself in every remarkable point of conduct of the African republic 2.

As foon as Pyrrhus had fettled his affairs in Syracuse, Leontium, and the other Pyrrhus's places that had submitted to him, he began to move with his army towards Agrigen- great progress tum, which was then possessed by a Carthaginian garrison, under the command of in Sicily. Phintias. Upon his march he received intelligence, that the inhabitants had expelled the Carthaginians, and were come to a resolution to admit him into their city, and join him with a good body of troops. Accordingly, upon his arrival on their frontiers, he was met by Sosistratus, at the head of eight thousand Agrigentine foot, and eight hundred horse, nothing at all inferior in military skill and bravery to the Epid rots themselves. Sosistratus likewise prevailed upon him to take thirty towns of the neighbouring country under his protection. Being abundantly supplied with darts, arrows, all other kinds of arms, and engines of battery, from Syracuse, he advanced into the Carthaginian territories, and reduced Heraclea, which was for some time defended by a party of Carthaginians. After this, the Azones, Selinuntines, Halicyæans, Egestines, and others, made their submission to him; in fine, the Carthaginians sound, that this conqueror foon deprived them of all their allies, made himself master of many of their towns without the least opposition, and was determined to make the Libyan sea, on the side of Greece, the boundary of their dominions 2.

Pyrrbus, in conformity to the plan he had laid down, advanced to Eryx, a fortress Takes Eryx by e defended by a numerous Carthaginian garrison, and of such natural strength, that it storm, and lays was almost inaccessible. This place, with some difficulty, he invested, and, after fiege to Lilybringing his battering rams to the walls, formed the siege of it. The garrison for baum. some time made a vigorous defence; but at last Pyrrbus, making a general assault, entered the breach his rams had opened, and bore down all before him. In order to render his name famous to all posterity, after the example of Hercules, he was the first who mounted the walls, after having killed many of the Africans with his own hand. However, he met with such a resistance, that his success was dubious, till a fresh reinforcement of his troops supported him in the attack, and then he easily carried the town. Panormus, Erela, and most other places of note, were either taken f by storm, or opened their gates to the victor upon the first summons; so that now the Carthaginians had no town left in Sicily but Lilybaum, to which Pyrrbus laid fiege with all his forces b.

Lilybaum was a maritime city of great strength, esteemed by the Carthaginians as But is obliged one of the keys of Sicily. They had therefore raised many outworks for its defence, to raise it. drawn a trench to prevent any approaches on the land-fide, and fortified it in the best manner possible. The Carthaginians, being masters of the sea, landed a strong body of troops here, just as Pyrrbus was going to form the siege of the place; but being

* Justin. ubi fup. c. 2. Polyb. l. iii. c. 25. Diod. Sic. l. xxii. in excerpt. Rhodoman. & Hoeschelii.

* Diod. Sic. Plut. Dion. Hal. Justin. ubi sup. & Univers. hist. vol. iii. Valer. Max.l. ii. vii.
Diop. Sic. ubi sup.

being greatly alarmed at the rapidity of his conquests, they sent embassadors to treat a of a peace with him upon very advantageous terms, offering him either a large sum of money, or to abandon all their conquests in Sicily, except Lilybaum. But he, puffed up with his great success, and spirited up by the Sicilians, who were sensible, that they could enjoy no tranquillity, as long as the Carthaginians had any footing in the island, answered them, that the only means to obtain what they defired, was to leave Sicily intirely to the Greeks. Upon this the Carthaginians broke off the negotiation, and Pyrrbus repeated his affaults with the utmost fury; but the town being well furnished with all forts of provisions and military stores, situated upon a rock, and defended by a numerous garrison, the Carthaginians repulsed him in every attack, and, at the end of two months, obliged him shamefully to raise the siege.

Notwithstanding which, he entertained to drop that design.

Notwithst anding this repulse, Pyrrhus began to entertain thoughts of attacking the Carthaginians in the very heart of their dominions, and therefore made all the thoughts of in necessary preparations to transfer the war into Africa. As he wanted seamen for this vading Africa; expedition, he obliged the maritime cities in his interest to furnish him with failors but is obliged and mariners, and even forced into the service persons of rank, who had any experience in naval affairs. The cities complained of this violence, but he had no regard to their complaints. This, with some other arbitrary proceedings, so disgusted the Sicilians, that they began to look upon him as a tyrant, and the cities in general conceived such an aversion to him, that some of them entered into a league with the Carthaginians, and others with the Mamertines, his avowed enemies. In confequence c of this, there was fuch a general defertion amongst the Sicilian troops in his service, most of whom went over to the Carthaginians, that he soon found himself attended only by his Epirot phalanx; which obliged him to lay afide all thoughts of any farther military operations, either in Sicily or Africa. The Carthaginians, being informed of this sudden revolution, sent a strong reinforcement to their army in Sicily, in order to recover their antient conquests there, whilst a mighty seet cruised round the island to prevent Pyrrhus from making his escape 4 (G).

He returns to Italy.

THAT prince therefore, meditating a return to Italy, embarqued with the remains of his troops on the vessels he brought to Sicily, being attended by a large additional number of Sicilian transports, with a considerable treasure on board, according to d With this fleet he fet sail for Rhegium, but was met at sea by the Carthaginian squadron, and obliged to venture an engagement; wherein being deseated, he had seventy of his ships sunk, and most of the rest so shattered, that they were rendered intirely unfit for service; so that he arrived at Locri, with only ten vessels, and from thence with great difficulty marched to Tarentum. The Carthaginians after this reduced the Sicilian towns before in their possession with as much celerity as Pyrrbus had conquered them, and fettled their affairs in Sicily upon a firmer footing than ever. It is faid, that Pyrrbus, when he was on the point of fetting fail, cried out to his men, at the fight of that wealthy country he was going to abandon, What a fine field of battle do we leave to the Carthaginians and Romans! a prediction which was foon afterwards verified. What happened to this prince after his arrival in Italy, it is unnecessary to touch upon here, fince an ample relation of this has been already given in other parts of our history c.

Hiero declared Syraculian

Notwithstanding the Carthaginians so easily dislodged the Epirots from their general of the part of Sicily, yet they had two powerful enemies still to contend with in that island, the Syracufians and the Mamertines. After Pyrrhus's departure, the former, being army, and pre- destitute of a governor, fell into the greatest disorders. Whilst their army lay encamped near Mergana, a quarrel arose betwixt the soldiers and the citizens, which had like to have been attended with fatal effects. Upon this, the foldiers elected Artemidorus and Hiero for their leaders, and vested them with an almost absolute authority. Hiero, tho' then very young, had all the good qualities to be wished for in any prince; and > c Idem ibid. & PLUT. in Pyrrh. ■ Idem ibid. & Dion. Hal. apud Vales. Vide & Liv. epit. 1. xiii. C Appian. Samnit. in excerptis Valesii. Plut. in Pyrrh. Justin. l. xxiii. c. 3. Univer. hist. vol. iii. p. 90, 91, 816, 817, &c. Vide & Flor. l. i. c. 18. & in eum Salmas. atq; Frienshem. Eutrop. Rom. hist. brev. l. ii. Lucium Ampelium in lib. mem. c. 28. aliosq; plur.

(G) Justin will have it, that Pyrrhus deseated the Carthaginians in several pitched battles whilst in Sieily, and gave them a notable overthrow just before his departure out of the island; but as Diodorus feems to clash with this account, no great stress is to be laid upon it (39).

a having, by the address and management of his friends, got possession of the city, foon suppressed the contrary faction. Far from being elated with his good fortune, he held the reins of government in fo gentle and flack a manner, that he gained the hearts of all men; infomuch that the Syracufians, though highly diffatisfied with the foldiery for affuming the right of chusing their own generals, received him as prætor, without the least contest; nay, according to Justin, they unanimously confirmed him in the command the army had conferred upon him, investing him with all the civil and military power during the inter-regnum. He is represented by the antient historians as a confummate hero, and most amiable prince; as one who, by the arts of infinuation and address, without shedding of blood, or hurting one single citizen, calmed b the minds of the people of Syracuse, and reconciled the different tactions, which then miserably distracted that unhappy state. He made his first campaign under Pyrrbus, and so improved in the art of war by the direction of that great general, that he was looked upon as the best commander in his army. The Syracusian forces under his command, destined to act against the Carthaginians, after the departure of Pyrrbus, being most excellently disciplined, obtained several considerable advantages over them, and even in a short time grew formidable to them f.

As for the Mamertines (H), the other enemy the Carthaginians had to deal with Abrief account in Sicily, they were originally a body of Campanian mercenaries, that Agathocles took of the Mamerinto his fervice. Being tempted with the beauty and opulence of Messana, they e formed a defign to make themselves masters of it by surprize, which took effect in the following manner: These troops, being denied by the Syracusians the right of giving their votes at the election of magistrates, immediately had recourse to arms; which threw the city into great confusion; but some persons of distinction interposing, it was at last agreed, that the Campanians should evacuate Sicily within a limited time, and carry off all their effects along with them. Upon the expiration of this term they retired to Messana, in order to embarque for their native country. Here they met with a most friendly and kind reception from the citizens; in return for which favour, they in the night either expelled or affaffinated all the men, took the women to their own use, and seized upon the city. After they had divided the d lands and riches of the unhappy Messanians amongst themselves, they called the city Mamertina, and assumed to themselves the name of Mamertini, that is, martial or warlike people, from Mamers, a word, which, in their language, being a dialect of the Oscan, fignified Mars, the (I) god of war. As they were a bold and resolute nation, they in a short time reduced many of the neighbouring states, and extended their conquests to the middle of the island. By the assistance of the Roman garrison at Rhegium, which, under the command of one Decius a Campanian, had seized upon

F POLYB. l. i. Justin. ubi fup. c. 4.

(H) Alfius gives us the following short history of the Mamertines: The whole country of the Samnites having been visited with a terrible pestilence, Sthenius Mettius, prince of that people, assembled all his subjects, and to'd them, that Apollo in a dream had assured him, that they should be delivered from the plague, provided they would make a vow to offer up to him all the produce of the next spring; which they immediately complying with, the plique ceased. Some time after it broke out again amongst them, and made great havock; upon which consulting Apollo, they were informed by him, that the return of the pestilence was owing to the non-observance of their vow, fince they had not facrificed to him the children born in the fpring above-mentioned; but that if they would banish all of them that were then living, and grown up, they should be delivered a second time from that dreadful evil. They immediately followed this advice of the god; and the men thus banished retiring to Sicily, came into that part of the island called Taurominitana, or Regio Taurominitana. The Messanians, being at that time engaged in a bloody war, defired their affiftance; which having obtained, they overcame all their enemies, and, as a grateful acknowledgment for the service done made them free of their city. As the republic of Messana was now grown more powerful by the coalition of two different nations, the Messanas proposed assuming a new name, and, in order to this, cast the names of twelve of the gods into an urn, by way of lots, resolving to take that which came out first. This happened to be Mamers; so that they were from that time called Mamertines (40).

(I) We are informed by Festus, that, in the Oscan tongue, Mamers fignified Mars, the god of war. Scaliger observes, that Mamers, Mavors, and Mars, amongst that people, denoted valiant. It has like-wise been supposed, that the word Mars comes from a more than the word Mars comes from amarus, or the Hebrew מרר amaritudo; and this notion is countenanced by the epithets minpes, δεινός, άγριος, βλοσυρός, δήϊος, χέτλιος, λυγρός, aueilinos, durus, torvus, rigidus, esc. which are frequently applied to him. Scaliger, in his notes upon Varro, thinks, that Mars, by reduplication, becomes Mamers (41).

(40) Alfius in lib. de prim. bel. Pun. apud Sext. Pomp. Fest. in voce Mamertini. Strab. l. vi. Vide & fos. Scalig. castigat. in Sext. Pomp. Fest. p. 82. edit. Par. 1593. (41) Sext. Pomp. Fest. in voce Mamers. fos. Scalig. de caus. ling. Lat. c. 69. Idem in not. ad Var. de ling. Lat. Vide & Isidor. Hispalens orig. l. viii. that city in the same infamous manner that the Mamertines had possessed themselves a of Messana, they soon became very powerful, and made frequent incursions both into the Syracusian and Carthaginian territories, plundering the country, and laying most of the towns and villages under contribution. The Romans, thinking their honour concerned in making an example of Decius, and his accomplices, for the slagrant violation of public saith they had been guilty of, attacked the city of Rhegium, took it by storm, and put to the sword all the garrison, except three hundred men, whom they carried to Rome; and after having scourged them with rods, in conformity to the Roman custom, beheaded them publicly in the forum. The Mamertines, being thus deprived of their main support, could not long defend themselves against the attacks of Fliero, who, on account of their repeated depredations, and for several b other weighty reasons, declared war against them. As that prince's troops were always ready to enter upon action, he immediately advanced to the frontiers, and cutting off all communication betwixt the Mamertines and the neighbouring states, encamped on (K) the river Longanus, where he put himself in a posture to receive the enemy, in case they should think proper to venture an engagement with hims.

They are artacked and defeated by Hicto, who, after this action, is proclaimed king of Syracute.

THE Mamertines, finding all the avenues leading to their capital city guarded by the enemy's detachments, and themselves reduced to great streights by Hiero's posfessing himself of so commodious a camp, were obliged to run the risque of a battle; and therefore drawing their forces, which confifted of eight thousand foot, and some horse, out of Messana, under the command of Cios, they encamped on the opposite c bank, and made the necessary dispositions to pass the river. In the mean time Hiero fent a choice detachment, confisting of two hundred Messanians, and sour hundred picked foldiers of his own troops, with orders to take post on the hill Thorax, and then wheeling about, to attack the enemy in the rear, whilst he himself, with the gross of his army, charged them in front. The action for some time was sharp and bloody, both sides behaving with undaunted resolution; but at last Hiero having gained an eminence near the river, which, being a very advantageous post, enabled him terribly to gall the enemy, the detachment posted upon the hill falling with great fury upon their rear, and they having with much difficulty already fustained the first shock of the Syracusian army, the Mamertines immediately gave ground, and soon after betook themselves to a precipitate slight. The Syracusians pursued them so d closely, that they put every man of them to the sword, except Cios (L), who having received many wounds in the engagement, fainted through loss of blood, and being taken prisoner, was brought half-dead into Hiero's camp. Hiero, being a prince of fingular humanity, ordered all possible care to be taken of that general, and his wounds to be dressed by the most skilfur surgeons in his army; but Cios, soon after feeing his fon's horse brought into the camp by a party of Syracusians, immediately concluded he was killed, which threw him into fuch an excess of grief, that he refused all comfort, tore in pieces the ligatures of his wounds, and chose rather to fall by his own hand, than survive a person so dear to him. This deseat, which Hiero gave the Mamertines in the plains of Mylæ, was the greatest blow that people ever received; e neither did they ever afterwards find it possible to re-establish their broken affairs. The troops were so highly pleased with Hiero's conduct in this battle, that they proclaimed him king of Syracuse upon his arrival at that metropolis h.

E POLYB l. i. Appian. Samnit. & Diod. Sic. l. xxii. in excerptis Valesii. h Diod. Sic. l. xxii. in excerpt. Rhodoman. & Hæschel. Polyb. ubi sup.

(K) Diodorus Siculus calls this river Loitanus; but we apprehend this to be a corruption of Longanus, the name given it by Polybius. We own, the generality of MSS. of the former author have ΛΟΙΤΑ-ΝΟΣ; but this cannot stand in competition with the great authority of Polybius. Besides, upon viewing the words ΛΟΙΤΑΝΟΣ and ΛΟΓΓΑΝΟΣ together, we shall find, that nothing can be conceived more easy than fuch a corruption; for ΓΓ IT in the middle of these words, the letters on which the true reading depends, resemble one another so nearly, that it is the easiest thing in nature to mistake the former for the latter. Cellarius, by taking notice only of Polybius's name, seems to have been intirely of our opinion (42).

(L) Diodorus tells us, that Cios affembled his footh-fayers, and consulted them, before he joined battle with Hiero. Upon viewing the facrifices narrowly, they unanimously declared, that he should lodge that night in the enemy's camp. This prediction of the entrails he took as an infallible token of victory, and therefore engaged the Syracusan army with great alacrity and courage, but had the missfortune to meet with the sate here mentioned. However, being brought a prisoner into Hiero's camp, the prediction was undoubtedly looked upon as sulfilled, though not in the sense in which he understood it. By such ambiguous answers both the oracles and haruspices frequently imposed upon those who consulted them (43).

7 6

THE Carthaginians, being apprifed of the great victory Hiero had gained over the Andis over-Mamertines, began to be uneasy at the progress of that prince's arms; but their reached by the uneasiness was much heightened, upon receiving intelligence, that the Mamertines had made some overtures to him for an accommodation, the principal of which was, that they should put the city of Messana into his hands, provided he would engage to maintain the inhabitants in the possession of their antient rights and privileges, and protect them against any foreign invasion. The Carthaginians endeavoured to traverse this negotiation; but finding themselves unable to prevent its taking effect, they formed a scheme to keep Messana out of the hands of the Syracusians. In order to this, Hannibal, who at that time commanded the Carthaginian forces in Sicily, b amused Hiero, till some troops, which he had kept concealed in the Lipari islands, drew near Messana. The cunning African came to Hiero, advancing to take possesfion of the place, as it were to congratulate him on his late victory, but in reality with an intention to retard the march of his troops to Messana. In the mean time an officer being fent, at the head of a detachment, into the town, affured the Mamertines, that he came as a friend, and that his only design was to affist them against the Syracusians, and prevent them from delivering their city into the enemy's hands. The Mamertines, being greatly weakened by the late overthrow, readily admitted the Carthaginian detachment, and by that means preserved themselves still independent both of the Syracusians and Carthaginians. These two last powers, finding they c had pursued wrong measures, afterwards entered into an alliance, and affembled their joint forces to form the siege of Messana. This obliged the Mamertines to call in the Romans to their aid; which gave rise to the first Punic war, a particular account of which will be found in the following fection i.

DIOD. SIC. & POLYB. ibid.

SECT. VI.

The history of the Carthaginians, from the first to the second Punic

THOUGH the Carthaginians had entered into an alliance with the Romans a little before Pyrrbus landed in Italy, and offered them powerful fuccours against that The Carthagiprince, yet, even at this time, there reigned a mutual jealousy and diffidence between nians advance the two states. As their power was very extensive, their political views and interests with a powerdiametrically opposite, and both of them seemed acted by the same spirit of ambi-rentum. when tion, it was morally impossible but that, sooner or later, a bloody quarrel must be fieged by the commence betwixt them. The Romans, proving superior to Pyrrbus, as has been Romans; which gives related, obliged him to abandon his Italian allies, whom, soon after his departure, great umbrage. they easily reduced 2. The Samnites received so terrible an overthrow from the con- to that nation. fuls L. Papirius Cursor and Sp. Corvilius, surnamed Maximus, that, from this time, they ceased to be a nation b. The Brutians and Lucanians were next obliged to submit; e so that only Tarentum remained to be chastised for incurring the displeasure of the Romans. As that city had not only embroiled the Romans with their neighbours, but likewise destroyed one of their fleets, insulted their embassadors, invited Pyrrbus over into Italy, and greatly exerted itself in assisting him to execute the project he had formed against the Roman republic, they were resolved to make it seel the effects of their resentment; and therefore the confuls, immediately after they had conquered the Brutians and Lucanians, caused it to be invested . Milo at this time commanded the Epirot garrison in the citadel, and the Tarentines had possession of the town. These two parties, being then at variance, instead of taking proper measures for the desence of the place, feemed to be under-hand contriving how they might deliver it up to a foreign power d. f As the Carthaginians lay at that time with a strong squadron of galleys, and a body of land-forces on board, before the town, and affected to treat only the Epirots as enemies, it was suspected, that the Tarentines had implored their assistance; and on the other hand Milo entered into a negotiation with the Romans, in order to put both the town and citadel into their hands; which at last he did, and that even by the consent a of the Tarentines themselves . The Carthaginians, being disappointed of their aim, retired to their own coasts; but the Romans were not a little chagrined at this step, fince they thereby discovered, not only that the Carthaginians intended to rob their republic of a city, which, by right of conquest, belonged to it, but likewise that they meditated the conquest even of Italy itself. Besides, could the design have been carried into execution, it would have been a notorious infraction of the treaty lately concluded between the two states. This therefore convinced the Romans, that the Carthaginians paid little regard to the faith of treaties, and consequently that they could not be too much upon their guard against the attempts of so perfidious, as well as enterprising a nation. That the Romans drew such a conclusion from the conduct b of the Carthaginians at this juncture, seems not only probable from the nature of the thing itself, but likewise from an observation of Cato f and Gellius; and therefore we may look upon it as a remote or pretended cause at least of the first Punic war; and indeed this is allowed by Zonaras, as well as Lucius Ampelius, one of their own later historians g.

* Flor. l. i. c. 18. Univers. hist. vol. iv. p 647. Polyb. l. i. b Flor. ubi sup. Zonar. in annal. l. xiii. c. 6, p. 377, 378, 379. c Idem ibid. & Liv. epit. l. xii. xiv. xv. &c. Oros. l. iv. Zonar. ubi sup. Liv. epit. & Oros. ubi sup. Univers. hist. vol. iv. p. 648. Zonar. ubi sup.

The Carthagimians jealous of the growing power of the Romans.

THE Romans, soon after the reduction of Tarentum, made themselves masters of all the countries in Italy, from the remotest part of Etruria to the Ionian sea, and from the Tyrrbenian sea to the Adriatic. This rapid progress of their arms gave a fresh alarm to the Carthaginians, who now confidered, that the Romans had a very short paffage over to Sicily, and that the continent of Italy could not limit their ambition. c They therefore began to look upon all their possessions in that island as very precarious, unless they could speedily reduce the exorbitant power of their rival within narrower bounds. Such a confideration as this must undoubtedly have increased the jealoufy, and heightened the difguft already conceived in the breafts of the Carthaginians, and had most certainly its proper influence in pushing them on to a rupture with the Komans h.

Decius Jubelgion of Campa-

THE inhabitants of Rhegium, being exposed to the attempts of Pyrrbus, as well as the lius, with a le- infults of the Carthaginians, who, foon after the arrival of that prince in Italy, infested gion of Campa-titans, seizes on all the Ionian sea, applied to the Romans for a garrison to defend them from an invasion. In compliance with their request, a legion of Campanians was raised, the Romans at that d time not being able to spare any of their own troops, on account of the war with Pyrrbus, and fent under the command of one Decius Jubellius, a native of Campania, to garrison that city. These troops, for some time, did their duty perfectly well; but at last, in imitation of the Mamertines, who had possessed themselves of Messana in a most perfidious manner, and, being of the same nation, affisted these Campanians with a body of forces to accomplish their design, they began to entertain thoughts of rendering themselves independent at Rhegium. To this they were strongly excited by the beauty and opulence of the place, and the elegancies the citizens abounded with. As the Romans at that time had their hands full of the war with Pyrrbus, they thought this a favourable juncture to bring their project to bear, since nothing but e the opposition which might be apprehended from that quarter could possibly obstruct the execution of it. Decius therefore, to colour his proceedings, pretended to have advice, that the Rhegians had entered into a conspiracy to deliver up the place to Pyrrhus, and betray the garrison into his hands. In order to prevent this, he suggested there was a necessity of taking possession of the town, and making an example of the conspirators. To support what he advanced, forged letters were produced, which he pretended to have intercepted, wherein all the particulars of the conspiracy were related at large. This, together with a fet speech on the occasion, made such an impression upon the troops, that they were prepared for any attempt, and ready at an instant to execute their general's orders. In the mean time a person, privy to f the defign, appearing, pretended to have certain news, that Pyrrbus had already made a descent on the territories of Rhegium, and was advancing towards the city, in order to have a conference with the principals of the conspiracy. This serving as a fignal to the Campanians, the train being already laid, they immediately took possession of the city, divided amongst themselves all the plunder found therein, and put most of the men to the sword i.

&quot;Univers hist. ubi sup. Zonar. annal. l. viii. c. 6. p. 379.

In noct. Attic. l. x. c. 1.

Lucius Ampel., in lib. memorial. c. 46. Vide & Zonar. ubi sup. c. 8.

p. 382.

Liv. epit. Oros. Univers hist. &c. ubi sup.

Polyb. & Val. Max. ubi sup. Diod. p. 382. h Liv. epit. Oros. Univers. Sec. l. xxii. apud Vales. Liv. epit. l. xii.

Nor long after the perpetration of this horrid fact, Decius was expelled by the The Romans foldiery, and obliged to fly to Messana. There being seized by a violent pain in his retake Rhegi-eyes, he applied to a Rhegian physician for relief; who, resenting the injuries offered put to the his country, prescribed him a plaister of cantharides, which totally deprived him of word, or be-his sight, and then made his escape. This we learn from Diodorus. But Appian head, all the intimates, that he was attacked by this disorder at Rhegium, and sent to Messana for Campanians; which, together a physician, not caring to trust any of those in the place where he resided. The Ma-with the defeat mertines fent him one eminent for his skill in the art of medicine, whom the last given the Maauthor infinuates to have been a Rhegian; who, applying caustics to his eyes, advised mertines by him to keep them on till his return, which never happened; so that in a short time this last people b he became stark-blind. Neither Polybius nor Dio take notice of any of these circum-to receives Itances; and therefore give us reason to believe, which is likewise consonant to the Carthaginian fragment of Appian just referred to, that he did not depart from Rhegium, as Diodo-detachment rus suggests, but met with the sate he deserved either in that place or Rome, with his accomplices and companions. Be this as it will, as foon as the Roman republic was in a condition to take vengeance of this perfidious legion, she ordered L. Genucius Clepsina to besiege Rhegium with a powerful army. The Campanians, being reinforced by a strong body of Mamertines, whom they had likewise assisted in their wars with the Syracusians and Carthaginians, made a vigorous defence; but the conful, redoubling his attacks, at last took the place, and put all the garrison to the c fword, except three hundred men, who were carried to Rome, and there punished with exemplary severity. They were whipped with rods in the middle of the forum, had their heads struck off, and their bodies remained, by the senate's order, unintetred. Appian relates, that Decius, being detained in close custody, grew impatient of his confinement, and laid violent hands on himfelf; but whether this happened at Rome or Rhegium, he fays not. In the mean time the Mamertines, having sustained a prodigious loss, not only by the flaughter of their troops sent to the assistance of the Campanians, but likewise by the destruction of their faithful ally, who had hitherto greatly contributed to support them against all their enemies, and receiving about the same time the terrible deseat from Hiero above-mentioned, found themd selves upon the point of submitting to the Syracusians. Some of the principal citizens, to prevent this, applied to the Romans for succours, who, for certain reasons, not being disposed to support them at that conjuncture, the Carthaginian faction in Messana admitted a Carthaginian detachment into the town, which immediately took possession of the citadel. The Roman party, highly incensed at such a point of conduct, hereupon resolved to send a second time to their friends for speedy relief. This step of the Carthaginians therefore must be allowed to have been the immediate cause of the first Punic wark.

As for the motives which prompted the Carthaginians to this war, we have just some of the hinted at them: a defire of securing and inlarging their acquisitions in Sicily; the principal moe necessity of humbling a proud rival, whose interests in every respect clashed with trues, which induced both theirs; a resolution to preserve the dominion of the (A) sea, and that extensive trade the Carthagi-they nians and Romans to under-

h Diod. Sic. l. xxii. Appian. & Dio Cass. in excerptis Vales. Vide & Diod. Sic. in excerpt. Rhodom. take the first POLYB. ubi sup. &c. Zonar. ubi sup. p. 382, 383. Oros. l. ii. c. 3. Val. Max. l. ii. c. 7. Punic war.

(A) That the Carthaginians were, for several centuries, extremely powerful by sea, cannot be disputed; nay, if John Tzetzes may be credited, they came as far with their fleets as the Thracian Bosporus, where they carried on a naval war with the Byzantines. However, this we cannot believe, as being intirely unsupported by any other author. That scholiast's words are. Όμοίως δὲ τέτοις κὸ ΚΑΡΧΗΔΟ΄ΝΙΟΙ κὸ Βυζάντιοι, διὰ πλοιαρία σκαλμά τιν διενεχθεντες, δεινώς έναυμάχησαν έν τω Βοσωόρω. Τεει-zes, in the place referred to, observes how common a thing it is for neighbouring states to quarrel, and that even about trifles; and, amongst others, brings the dispute betwirt the KAPXHAONIOI and the Bu av Tioi, in the passage before us, as an instance of it. As therefore the Carthaginians and Byzantines could never have been looked upon as neighbours, the passage under consideration wants undoubtedly to be emended; which will be done to fatisfaction, Vol. VI. Nº 11.

if for KAPXHAONIOI we read KAAXHAO-NIOI; fince the people of Chalcedon or Calchedon were most certainly neighbours to the Byzantines, and sometimes embroiled with them. That the people of Chalcedon were neighbours to the Byzantines, is evident from the situation assigned that city by Stephanus, Tacitus, Pliny, and Strabo; fince, according to these authors, it stood over-against Byzantium, on the opposite shore. In order to support our emendation farther, it may not be improper to observe, that tho', in printed books, for the most part, we find the name of this city to be XAΛΚΗΔΩΝ, yet, in antient coins, which are of much greater authority, it is always exhibited KAA-XH $\Delta\Omega$ N, and the people named KAAXH $\Delta$ ONIOI, or, in the Doric dialect, KAAXAAONIOI. This is fo strong a proof of the error of the printed books, and many MSS. in this particular, that Hardouin has corrected the MSS, and printed editions of Pliny, and n i

5

,11

5 4

of-

D

they then enjoyed; these, we say, were undoubtedly the principal motives, which a prevailed upon them to engage in this famous quarrel. The Romans likewife, in all probability, were influenced by reasons of much the same kind: a thirst after empire, an abhorrence of the Carthaginian genius, a fear that so false a friend would get a footing in Italy; in fine, a notion, that their political views were intirely repugnant to those of the Carthaginians, disposed them to a rupture with that people. That the possession also of the fertile islands of Sicily and Sardinia, which, they imagined, must of course fall to the victor, had great weight with the Romans, in determining them to enter upon a war with Carthage, is extremely probable, and even acknowledged by some of their own writers. The first Punic war, according to Polybius, lasted twenty-four years m, and was carried on chiefly by sea, both sides struggling hard b for the dominion of that element. As Sicily, the object of this dispute, was an island, fuch a contention was very natural. We shall now proceed to give a brief account of the principal transactions of every campaign, in order of time as they happened a.

The Roman tana fend to Rome for fuc. cours against the Carthagi-

THE Roman faction in Messana, upon the admission of a Carthaginian garrison into faction in Mes- the citadel, dispatched fresh deputies to Rome, to solicit assistance from the republic. Upon their arrival, in the name of their principals, they offered the possession of Messana to the Romans, and, in the most moving terms, implored their protection. The conscript fathers, imagining that a compliance with this request would destroy the uniformity of their conduct, and make them lose the high character they had gained by the fevere punishment lately inflicted upon the perfidious Campanian c legion, were for some time in suspense what course to take: but afterwards confidering what vast territories the Carthaginians possessed in Africa and Spain; that they were masters of a great part of Sicily, Sardinia, and the other islands lying on the coast of Italy; that they had a design on Italy itself, which they would most certainly put in execution, if they could intirely reduce Messana, and seize upon the whole island of Sicily; they either really were, or pretended to be, under great apprehensions for their own fafety, and therefore appeared disposed to support the Mamertines. This disposition was soon turned into a resolution by the unanimous voice of the people, who, having been greatly impoverished by the late wars, and proposing to themselves no small advantages from an invasion of Sicily, to which likewise they were strongly d excited by those who expected the command of the armies destined for that service, were very eager from the beginning for an attempt to deliver Messana. The senate therefore decreed, that this enterprize should be undertaken; and in consequence of this decree, which was likewise confirmed by an ordinance of the people, Appius Claudius, one of the confuls, received orders to attempt a passage to Sicily, at the head of a powerful army.

THE conful, being obliged to stay some time longer in Rome, where his presence Jends C. Clau- was then necessary, on account of some affairs of moment, commanded one Caius eius, a legion- Claudius, a legionary tribune, and a person of great intrepidity and resolution, to ary tribune to act in his flead, advance with a few (B) vessels to Rhegium. Claudius, upon his arrival there, observe e

1 FLOR. & LUCIUS AMPEL. ubi sup. Vide etiam DIONYS, HALICAR, ant. Rom. l. ii. & Polyb. ubi supra. m Polyb. ubi sup. n Vide Zonar. ubi sup. Liv. epit. Eutrop. l. ii. Oros. l. iv. August. de civ. Dei, 3, 18. Auct. vit. vir. illustr. 37, & seq. Polyb. ubi sup. Sil. Ital l. vi. Flor. l. ii. c. 2. Appian. in Libye. VAL. MAX. paf. aliofq; script. plurim.

Seguin those of Strabo, by the help of these coins. Spanheim likewise looks upon ΚΑΛΧΗΔΩΝ to be indisputably the true name; which, together with the authority of Memnon in Photius, Justellus, &c. fixes the point we are infifting on beyond contra-

(B) Zonaras calls these vessels triremes; but in this he not only contradicts Polybius, but himself. For Polybius afferts, that neither quinqueremes nor triremes were in use amongst the Italians before the first Punic war; and as for Zonaras himself, he assures us, that the Romans were intirely ignorant of every thing relating to the building and equipping of fleets before the commencement of their first quarrel with Carthage. We are told by some writers, that a Carthaginian galley, venturing too near the shore, was stranded, and taken by the Romans; and that, after the model of this galley, the Romans built many of those vessels, of which their first fleet was composed. This must have been a trireme; fince, according to Polybius, their first fleet consisted both of quinqueremes and triremes. And Aurelius Victor gives us to understand, that the first Carthaginian quinquereme, which fell into the hands of the Romans, was taken by Appius Claudius, in his passage from Messana to Rhegium (1).

(1) Joh. Tzetz. schol. in Hesiod. Egy. 2 nuég. a. p. 83. edit. Dan. Heinsii, ex officin. Plantin. Raphelengii, 1603. Plin. l. v. Steph. Byzant. de urb. Tasit. l. xii. c. 63. Strab. l. vii. p. 221. & l. xii. p. 387. Appian. in bell. Mithrid. p. 367. Eutrop. l. vi. c. 5. Claudian. ver. 176. Pet. Seguin. p. 145. Jo. Hard. in Plin. Ez. Spanhem. de us. & prast. numism. ant. & in orb. Rom. exercit. ii. c. 18. p. 459, 460. Memn. apud Phot. in biblioth. cod. caxiv. p. 381. edit. Haschelii. Justel. in cod. can. eccles. &c. Vide & Polyan. strat. l. vi. c. 25. (2) Zonar. in annal. l. viii. c. 8. p. 381. edit. Car. du Fresne, Paris. 1686. Polyb. l. i. Aurel. Vict. sive aust. vit. vir. illustr. 37. Univers. hist. vol. iv. p. 657.

a ing the Carthaginian squadron to be infinitely superior to his own, and absolute matters of the streights, thought it would be little inferior to madness to attempt at that time transporting any forces to Sicily; and therefore contented himself, for the present, with watching the enemy's motions. However, he soon after, in a small boat, boldly crossed the streights himself, and had a conference with the Mamertines; but finding that people awed by the Carthaginian garrison in the citadel, he returned to Rhegium, without having been able to prevail upon them to accept of the Roman protection. Notwithstanding which, in a little time, he received advice, that the Mamertines, being desirous of expelling the Carthaginians, and recovering their former absolute independency, were in motion; upon which he ventured a second time b to Messana, and assured the Mamertines, that the sole view of his republic was, to restore them to the full enjoyment of all their rights and privileges, and preserve them in that situation. Then addressing himself to the Carthaginian officers there present, he, with an air of dignity, told them, that they either ought immediately to abandon the place, or assign a reason for their continuance in it. The Mamertines, being under some restraint, by reason of the Carthaginian troops, which had taken post amongst them, were silent; and the Carthaginians, being, in effect, masters of the place, would not vouchsafe him an answer. Directing himself therefore to the latter, he told them, they had reason to be filent, since the iniquity of their conduct would not admit of a vindication. And as for you, Mamertines, added he, your c silence I take to be a full proof of your passion for liberty; since, if you were disposed to be flaves to fuch imperious mafters, nothing could hinder you from declaring for them. The Mamertines, animated by the tribune's boldness, applauded his speech, and shewed their readiness to receive the Roman succours. Claudius, having thus happily gained his point, departed to the opposite shore, and made the necessary dispofitions to transport a body of forces to Messana without delay.

THE Carthaginians, being informed of the resolution taken at Rome to affist the The Romans Mamertines, fent a body of forces, and a strong squadron of galleys, under the land in Sicily, command of Hanno, to Sicily. That general, receiving intelligence, that Claudius themselves of had set sail from Rhigium with a (C) small Roman sleet, and was steering towards Messana.

POLYB. l. i. AUREL. VICT. five auct. vir. illustr. 37. Liv. epit. l. xvi. Univ. bist. vol. iii. p. 93, 94. & vol. iv. p. 652. Zonar. l. viii. c. 8, 9. Oros. ubi sup. c. 7.

(C) That the Romans were not intirely unacquainted with the art of navigation before the time of the first Punic war, is apparent from hence, that they were contiguous to the Etruscans, a nation (2) very powerful by fea many centuries be-fore this war, from whom they must undoubtedly have received some knowledge of sea-affairs; nay, they had conquered Etruria, and confequently made themselves masters of the Etruscan power both by fea and land, before the commencement of the first Punic war. It is true, the Etrascan power, particularly by sea, had been declining many years before the Romans reduced Etraria; but confidering how celebrated the Etruscans had been (4) for the figure they made by sea in former ages, we cannot suppole them intirely void of shipping, when conquered by the Romans. Besides, several very antient Roman coins, prior to the first Punic war, if not as old as the regal government, plainly prove the Romans not to have been absolute strangers to the art of constructing ships in earlier ages, since different parts of thips are visible on the reverses of these (5) coins. On the other hand, it must be allowed, that, till the period above-mentioned, the Romans were much more intent upon rendering themselves formidable by land, than by fea; neither is it at all natural to believe, that they should have entertained any thoughts of building and equipping a fleet of any force, before they had formed a delign of attacking the dominions of some rival state, separated from their own by the watry element; and so we find, in fact, it happened. After having premifed this, we think we may venture to allow a possibility of reconciling Polybius with himself, in his relation of the manner and period, wherein the Romans first en-deavoured to fit out a fleet. That the Romans applied themselves to commerce long before the times we are now speaking of, is evident from the two first treaties they concluded with the Carthaginlans, and from several other incidents taken notice of in the Roman history, as we have elsewhere observed; but then it is probable, that, for the most part at least, they traded in Italian bottoms, making use of the ships of their allies, who are expresly mentioned in those treaties, on such occasions. Be this as it will, it is certain, that they generally, if not always, as we are inclined to believe they did, applied to their allies for ships of war and naval suc-cours, whenever they wanted them. This is evident from Justin and Polybius, to omit other authors, from whom it appears, that, in the treaty concluded with Carthage near the time of Pyrrhus's

T.

/41

(3) Diod. Sic. l.v. & l. xi. Palaphat. n. 21. Strab. l. v. Athen deipnosoph. l. vii. p. 296. Plin. l. vii. c. 56. isidor. l. xviii. c. 4. & l. xix. c. 1. Draco Corcyreus & Menodatus Samius apud Athen. in deipnosol. xv. Dempst. de Etrur. regal. l. iii c. 81, 82, 83, 84. edit. Florent. 1723. Vide & Phil. Bonarot. explic. & covjett. ad mon. op. Dempst addit. p. 51. edit. Florent. 1726. (4) Herodot. l. i. Thucyd. l. i. sub. ivit. en avgulin archient. init. & author. jam citat. (5) Plin, nat. hift. l. xiii. c. 3. Anton. Augustin. archiepisc. Tarracon. antiquit. Roman. & Hispanar. in num. vet. dial. i. p. 5. B. Latine edit. ab And. Schotto, Antwerp. 1617. Vide & Volusium Metianum in lib. de asse.

coming

Messana, in order to throw a body of troops into that place, immediately went in a quest of him; and coming up with him near the coast of Sicily, attacked him with great fury. He had scarce begun the attack, when a violent storm arose, which dashed many of the Roman vessels in pieces against the rocks, they not being so capable of riding out a storm as the Carthaginian, and did their squadron infinite prejudice; infomuch that Claudius, finding himself engaged with two enemies at once, was forced to give way. He was therefore totally defeated, most of his ships taken, others destroyed, and he himself obliged to retire with great difficulty to Rhegium. Hanno, either to pique the Romans in point of honour, or to divert them from sending succours to Messana, restored all the vessels he had taken from Claudius, who, when the Carthaginian deputies arrived, was refitting his fleet. These b deputies, upon their arrival, proposed a treaty of peace to the tribune; which being rejected, they had some warm expostulations with the Romans, whom they accused of a violation of former treaties, declaring, that the Carthaginians would never fuffer the Romans to be masters of the streights betwixt Italy and Sicily, nor even to wash their hands in them. This, for the present, cut off all hopes of a pacification, so that Claudius refumed his military preparations with the utmost vigour; which having completed, and narrowly observed when the wind and tide favoured him, he weighed anchor a fecond time, and eluding the vigilance of the Carthaginian squadron posted to intercept them, got fafe into the port of Messana. The Mamertines having surrendered the town to him, Hanno thought proper to retire into the citadel; but at c the defire of Claudius, and the heads of the Mamertines, he had a conference with them, when he was perfidiously arrested by one of the legionaries, at the command of the Roman general, and detained a considerable time prisoner. This step greatly intimidated the Carthaginian garrison, and, with some succeeding persuasions and menaces intermixed, induced them to furrender the citadel to Claudius. Hanno. being afterwards released, went to Carthage, to justify his conduct; which having the misfortune not to do to the fatisfaction of the senate, he was, by their order, immediately crucified. Polybius tells us, that his countrymen suspected him guilty either of cowardice or treachery; but that he really deferved fuch an imputation, does not appear from any point of his conduct. On the contrary, the cowardice of the Car- d thaginian garrison, when deprived of their commandant, and the perfidiousness of Claudius, seem to have been the true causes of the loss of the citadel. Nothing can be inferred to his prejudice from the cruel and ignominious death he met with, fince that was a fate common to the most famous Carthaginian generals when unsuccessful P.

The Carthaginians and Syraculians lay fiege to Meftuna. The Carthaginians, being determined at all events to dislodge the Romans from Messana, raised a formidable army, and equipped a powerful fleet, for that purpose, appointing another Hanno, the son of Hannibal, commander in chief of these forces. This general, landing his troops at Lilybæum, invited Hiero, king of Syracuse, to enter into an alliance with the Carthaginians, and then marched to Selinus, near which city he encamped; from whence, at the head of a considerable detachment, he eadvanced to Agrigentum, and repaired the fortifications of the citadel there. The Agrigentines were easily prevailed upon to declare for the Carthaginians; and Hanno, upon his return to the camp at Selinus, found embassadors from Hiero, who had coming to Italy, it was stipulated, that the Carthaginians should assist the Romans with a squadron, in case they should be attacked by that prince; and that, in the beginning of the first Punic war, Claudius could not pass over to Sicily, till he was supplied with ships by the Tarentines, Locrians, and Neapolitans. That the Romans never equipped a steet of any consequence before this war, or had even any quinqueremes or triremes amongst them, likewise farther appears from their being totally ignorant of the art of rowing and navigating those vessels, which they found themselves obliged to learn first upon land; nor indeed is it possible to conceive, that they should have had any squadron of note before they had these galleys, since the chief strength of sleets, in the age we are now upon at least, consisted in such galleys. The Romans therefore might have had a tew coasting-vessels, and rude galleys or biremes, of their own, in the times preceding the first Punic war; but they never crossed the seas with any squadron of quinqueremes or triremes till now, as appears from Polybius, Livy, and others. Polybius therefore, in his account of the first sleet the Romans sitted out, must be understood as speaking of these ships only. And indeed that the Romans were totally ignorant of the construction of this fort of vessels, and that they were not used in any part of Italy before the first rupture of the Romans with the Carthaginians, may be certainly inferred from the express words of that excellent historian (6).

P Polyb. ubi sup. Val. Max. l. ii. c. 7. Vide & Justin. atq; Diodor. pass.

a orders to concert with him the proper measures for driving the Romans out of Sicily. Pursuant to the plan of operations Hanno and Hiero had laid down, those two generals marched with their united forces to Messana, and immediately invested the town. Before they besieged the place in form, they summoned the Roman garrison to surrender; which they refusing to do, Hanno put all the Italian soldiers in the Carthagiman fervice to the fword, and thereby rendered an accommodation with the Romans, on the part of his nation, impracticable. The Carthaginians pitched their tents at Senes (D), a town in the neighbourhood of Messana, and posted their fleet near the promontory (E) Pelorus, to prevent any supplies coming by sea; whilst Hiero encamped on the hill Chalcidicus, in order to cut off all communication betwixt the b belieged and the neighbouring country. The Romans, being apprifed of these motions, dispatched the consul Appius Claudius himself, at the head of a powerful army, to Rhegium; who, upon his arrival there, sent embassadors to Hiero, conjuring him, by the antient friendship betwixt the Romans and him, to desist from the siege he had undertaken, promising at the same time, that not the least damage should be offered to his territories. Hiero answered, that the Mamertines had posfessed themselves of Messana in the most villainous manner; that they had razed the cities of Gela and Camarina, and treated the inhabitants with unheard-of cruelty; that therefore such a nest of banditti ought to be intirely extirpated; that the Romans could not, without a manifest deviation from their pretended equity, take them c under their protection; and that in case, contrary to expectation, this should happen, the world would naturally conclude, that they were not influenced by the maxims of rigid probity and justice, as they would have mankind believe, but swayed by ambition, their aim being not to fuccour the diffressed, but to make themselves masters of the island of Sicily 4.

THE conful, having received this answer, resolved to pass over into Sicily with And are deall possible expedition; but, to conceal his design, gave out, that he could not ven-feated by the ture upon that enterprize, before he had consulted the senate. This stratagem was of Claudius. fignal fervice to him, fince the Carthaginian squadron posted to oppose his passage would undoubtedly have been too strong for him, had they been apprised of his resod lution; but this report reaching their ears, they guarded the streights with less care and vigilance. In the mean time Appius, going on board a (F) galley, built unskilfully, and in great haste, pretended to coast along the shore in his way to Rome; but, as foon as he was out of fight, he tacked about, and, being favoured by a dark POLYB. ubi fup. Diodor. Sic. in excerpt. Rhodoman. & Hoeschelii. Georg. Syncel. in chronograph. p. 275, edit. Par. 1652.

(D) The Greek name of this place in Polybius is EHNEIE, in Diodorus FTNEIE, which Rhodomanus translates cubilia. Whether the word is a proper name, or an appellative emphatically used, cannot now be determined, fince none of the old geographers have taken any notice of a place known by this name in the neighbourhood of Messana. However this may be, it is probable, that the words used by Polybins and Diodorus (7) were originally the same, though afterwards rendered different by the carelessness and inattention of transcribers. The great affinity betwixt the letters [SHNEIS, EYNEIS] of which they confift, fince H is often written in MSS. M, one fide of which might be eafily defaced by length of time, and the letter thereby mis-taken for a T, and the two initial letters in many MSS. being nearly the same, gives good ground for fuch a supposition.

(E) It is fomething furprifing, that so learned a man as Rhodomanus, in his Latin version of Diodorus, should translate the word AKPA here arx, which fignifies a fort or citadel; whereas it ought to have been rendered promontorium, a cape or promontory. It is true, AKPA answers to both the fignifications of arx and promontorium; but that, in this place, it should be confined to the latter, is evident from Polybius, who intimates, that the Carthaginian fleet lay near cape Pelorus or Peloris, and lined the coast. That this cape or promontory was called Pelorias, the name Diodorus here ules, appears from Ovid and Solinus; which proves Diodorus exactly to correspond with Polybius. It must therefore be allowed, that here is a second instance produced, to which many others might be added, of Rhodomanus's inaccuracy in his above-mentioned version (8).
(F) Aurelius Victor intimates, that this Claudius, who was surnamed Caudex, and the brother of Appius Claudius Cacus, or the blind, crossed the Appins Clauses Cacus, or the olima, croiled the streights first in a small sister-boat, with a few transports attending him, in order to discover the disposition of the Mamertines, and reconnoitre the enemy; which having done, he returned to Rhegium in the same vessel, and had the good had the action of Carehaginian environments. luck to take a Carthaginian quinquereme, with a body of foot, in his passage, on board of which he foon after transported a Roman legion to Messana, following himself with his whole fleet, and the rest of the land-forces. This general likewise is said by the same author to have distinguished himself against the Volsmians; which doubtless induced the senate to give him the command of the army destined to act against the Carthaginians and their allies in Sicily (9).

(7) Polyb. & Diod. Sic. in loc. citat. (8) Idem ibid. Solin. c. 5. Ovid. fast. ver. 479. See likewise this vol. p. 764. not. (M). (9) Aurel. Vict. sive auct. vit. vir. illustr. 37.

ni i

IX

: B est k

night, reached, with some transports, the nearest coasts of Sicily, and landed his a forces, without being perceived by the enemy. He had no fooner landed, but he took a view of both the enemies armies and their fleet; and finding them vaftly superior to his own, that they pushed on the siege with the utmost vigour, and that, in all probability, the town must foon capitulate, unless their camps could be forced, which could not be done without a great effusion of blood, he resolved to make another effort to bring about an accommodation between the contending parties. In order to this, he dispatched ministers a second time both to Hiero and the Carthaginians, with fresh proposals for a peace, purely, as it should seem, to amuse them, till he had received a reinforcement from Rome, and was able to attack them with a better prospect of success; but the negotiation proving ineffectual, and finding, not- b withstanding the inequality of numbers, that he must either conquer or die, he first attacked the Syracusians, and that with such intrepidity, that tho' for some time they defended themselves with great bravery, putting the Roman cavalry into disorder. he defeated them, and entered Messana in a triumphant manner, loaden with their spoils. Following his blow, he fell immediately upon the Carthaginians, whose camp was at some distance from that of the Syracusians, as has been before observed; who, being surprised by the suddenness of the attack, were put to the rout, and, for the most part, either cut to pieces, or dispersed. The Romans however, in all probability, would not have bought these advantages at so cheap a rate, had Hanno and Hiero opposed them with their united forces, as in good policy they ought to have c done; but Hiero, finding that the Romans landed their troops without any obstruction from the Carthaginian fleet, immediately concluded, that Hanno kept a secret correspondence with the enemy, and therefore was afraid of reposing too great a considence in him; in consequence of which distrust, Hiero decamped hastily in the night, after the late advantage Claudius had obtained over him, though he was not in the least obliged to it, fince the Romans could not force his camp. The enemy had hereby thrown into their hands an opportunity of attacking the Carthaginians with their whole strength, and gaining a most signal victory over them. This is the account given us by Polybius; but Zonaras relates that event differently. According to him, the Carthaginian camp was so secured by the sea and a morass, that it was d accessible only by one avenue, which, being a narrow passage, and fortified by a strong wall, the Romans found it impossible to enter. After a furious assault, they were beaten off by a shower of darts, and forced to retire with great loss. The Carthaginians, thinking themselves now sure of victory, pursued the legionaries to the walls of the town; but the latter, having drawn the enemy out of their impregnable camp, faced about with great bravery, and in their turn repulsed them with such flaughter, that they never durst appear afterwards, as long as Claudius continued in Messana. Claudius afterwards, finding no enemy to make head against him in the field, ravaged the enemy's territories in a dreadful manner, making excursions to the very gates of Syracuse; nay, if Zonaras may be credited, he laid siege to that e place, though the Syracusians defended themselves with such valour, that he had no prospect of reducing it. They cut off abundance of his men in the fallies they made, and in one of them had taken him prisoner, had he not luckily just before proposed fome terms of peace to Hiero, which prevented the garrison from pushing matters to the last extremity. As Hiero was inwardly a well-wisher to the Romans, he did not fhew himself displeased at the consul's overtures; but the campaign being almost at an end, and Claudius leaving the island soon after, the negotiation was suspended till the following year. Thus the Carthaginians not only lost Messana, but almost all possibility of recovering it. Those of them that escaped the late carnage took shelter in the neighbouring fortified towns, expecting to be put into a condition of acting offensively the following spring. As for Claudius, having left a strong garrison in Messana, the season being far advanced, he passed over to Rhegium, and from thence purfued his journey to Rome r.

The Romans detach Hiero from the Carthaginian ininto a negotiation with him.

AFTER the conful's departure, Hiero and the Carthaginians, drawing together a body of regular troops, reduced many towns that had fallen to the enemy. But the fucceeding confuls, Manius Octacilius Crassus and Manius Valerius Flaccus, transportterest, and enter ing to Sicily two consular armies, consisting each of eight thousand legionaries, and

r Polyb. & Diodor. ubi sup. Auct. vit. vir. illustr. ex. 37, & seq. Zonar. l. viii. c. 9. Sex. Jul. Frontin. strat. l. i. c. 4. ex. 11. Vide etiam Eutrop. l. ii. Oros. ubi sup. & Sil. Ital. l. vi.

a fix hundred horse, with a great number of auxiliaries, upon their arrival recovered most of those places. They first laid siege to Adranum, and took it by storm. Afterwards they advanced to Conturipe, and encamped before it. Whilst they were making preparations for an attack, there arrived embassadors in the camp from the Alæsimans (G), who desired to be taken under the protection of the Romans; and about fixty-seven other towns followed their example. The confuls, animated by fuch a rapid progress, moved with all their forces towards Syracuse, the capital of the island, with an intention to form the siege of that city. Their approach scattered terror throughout the island, and so intimidated Hiero, who now plainly discovered the great superiority of the Romans in this war, that he began to entertain thoughts b of renewing the negotiation, which Claudius's fudden departure out of Sicily had broken off towards the close of the last campaign. As the treaty concluded betwint the Romans and Hiero did not a little contribute to the declention of the Carthaginian power, we shall beg leave here to touch upon a few particulars relating to that remarkable event, as well as to Hiero himself, which have been omitted in all former parts of this work '.

AFTER Pyrrhus's precipitate retreat, the Carthaginians became on a sudden so Hiero comes to powerful in Sicily, that the Greek cities there thought themselves in danger of being an accommon forestilly over my by that pation with the speedily over-run by that nation; nay, Polyanus incimates, that there was an actual Romans.

war betwixt these two powers, and that the Carthaginian admiral, by a stratagem, c gained a considerable advantage over Hiero. This induced Hiero to court the friendthip of the Romans, looking upon them as the only power that could give a check to the towering projects of the Carthaginians, and defeat their ambitious defigns. He therefore fent a supply of troops and provisions to the Roman forces then employed in the siege of Rhegium, which enabled them to reduce that place, and consequently rendered them more capable of supporting him, whenever he should stand in need of their assistance. This was the basis of that good understanding, which subsisted for so long a time between the two powers, though it at first met with a short inter-The Carthaginians, ever jealous of the neighbouring states, and now particularly fo of the Romans, took umbrage at this harmony, as plainly discovering the drift of it. In order therefore to traverse it, they prevented Hiero from possessing himself of Mellana, made it a pretext for a quarrel with the Romans, and pretended to take the Mamertines under their protection. Hiero, finding the Romans not willing to act in favour of the Mamertines, upon the first application of that people to them, and that the Carthaginians, at the same time they entered the citadel of Messana, expressed a desire of being upon good terms with him, thought it agreeable to his interest to enter into an alliance with the latter; which he accordingly did, and, in conjunction with them, declared war against the Romans. This brought on the action above-mentioned between Hiero and Claudius, wherein the former being defeated, fled to Syracuje, looking upon himself as betrayed by the Carthaginians, because their fleet had not hindered Claudius from landing his troops in Sicily. The e Carthaginians could never afterwards make a friend of that prince; so great an aversion did he, from this period, conceive to them. Claudius, pursuing Hiero to his capital city, besieged him therein; which still made him more desirous of abandoning the Carthaginians, and which he undoubtedly then had done, fince Claudius proposed an accommodation to him, had not the plague broke out in the Roman army, which, together with a famine, and the vigorous defence of the belieged, obliged the conful to draw off, and, as should seem, precipitately to leave the island. However, the next year matters took another turn: the Romans, in the beginning of the campaign, conquered a good part of Sicily almost without opposition, advanced, at the head of their legions, to the gates of Syracuse, and invested the town. At the f fame time, according to Philinus (H), they besieged Echetla, a fortress in the depend-

ZONAR. annal. l. viii. c. 9. FLOR. l. ii. c. 2. POLYB. ubi sup. Liv. epit. l. xvi. Diodor. Sicul. in excerpt. Rhodoman. l. xxiii. Ogos. ubi sup.

(G) The Greek word, in all the printed and manuscript copies of Polybius, is AAIZINOI, in which, through the neglect or ignorance of transcribers, [A] has been omitted. This is so apparent, that we think it sufficient in the house of its think it fufficient just to have taken notice of it.

(H) This Philinus we have already had occasion to mention as a very partial historian; but Polybius likewise represents him as one absolutely inconfistent with himself, and guilty of the greatest absurdities. A certain author, whom we have before taken notice of, thinks, from the corrupted proper name Philanius, that he was the same person Cornelius Ne-pos teils us wrote the history of Hannibal. From hence, and fome MSS. of Nepos, it seems to follow, ŀe,

Ö

Ľ

1

1

Ü

j, n1

ti 1

the

ort

gd

ency of Syracuse. The Syracusian nobility, having now a prospect of nothing but a a long train of calamities, intreated their sovereign to make overtures for a peace to the Roman generals, and thereby prevent the ruin that threatened them. Such a defire falling in with Hiero's natural fentiments, he readily complied with it; fo that dispatching embassadors immediately to the Roman camp, a treaty of fri ndship and alliance was concluded to the fatisfaction of both parties. Many things concurred to dispose the Romans to facilitate so salutary a work; but it will be sufficient to observe here, that, by the conclusion of this treaty, they got, according to Eutropius, two hundred talents of silver, or, as Diodorus will have it, an hundred and forty thousand drachmas, a plentiful supply of provisions through the suture course of this war, and found themselves enabled to reduce their army in Sicily to two legions. b For an account of the particular articles of this treaty, we must refer our readers to the history of Syracuse  $^{c}(I)$ .

Which the Carstruct, but in

THE interest both of Hiero and the Romans rendered an accommodation necessary: thaginians en-deargour a sh the Romans could not have carried on the war with any tolerable prospect of success for want of provisions, since the Carthaginians, being masters at sea, could easily have intercepted their convoys, and cut off all supplies, that might have come from the coasts of Italy, as they actually did the last year, which reduced the Romans to the extremities hinted at above. And, on the other hand, Hiero found the Carthagimians not able to protect his dominions, nor himself in a capacity to make head against the consuls. If Livy, Zonaras, Eutropius, and Syncellus, may be credited, he c received several overthrows from the Romans since the breaking out of this war. which, in all probability, must have intirely exhausted him. The peace concluded at first was not perpetual, but only for a term of fourteen years. The Carthaginians endeavoured by all possible means to obstruct the negotiation, but without any effect. With this view it was that Hannibal, the Carthaginian general, advanced with a strong body of troops to Xiphonia, giving Hiero to understand, that he was in a condition to support him; but hearing that every thing was settled, he thought proper to retire ".

The Romans reduce several

THE Carthaginians, being thus deserted by their ally, found themselves obliged to bear the whole burden of the war, which yet they believed themselves capable of d towns in Sicily. doing. They were so far from being dispirited on this occasion, that they resolved to exert themselves in an extraordinary manner, to drive the Romans out of Sicily, and even to oblige king Hiero to renounce his new alliance. They placed numerous garrisons in all their frontiers, persected the works of their fortisted towns, and sent officers, with large sums of money, to make levies in Liguria, Gaul, and Iberia. The Romans in the mean time, marching into the Carthaginian territories, laid siege to Adranon and Macella, which they carried on with great vigour, but were repulsed in all their affaults, and at last forced to rise from before them. However, they met with better fuccess at Segesta (K), which, having been founded by Æneas, or at least that he was called by Cicero, Silenus. But both these notions are overthrown by Diodorus Siculus, who, in agreement with Polybius, calls him Philinus; and tells us, that he was an Agrigentine, and wrote the history of the first Punic war, without entering at all into his character. Had this been duly attended to, it might have prevented some mistakes in Hendreich, Vossius, and others (10).

> TZONAR. ubi sup. p. 379, 380. Eutrop. hist. Rom. l. ii. Polyen. strat. l. vi. c. 16. ex. 4. Liv. Flor. & Diod. Sic. ubi sup. Philinus apud Polye. l. i. Vide & Univers. hist. vol. iii. p. 96, 97, &c. LIV. EUTROP. & ZONAR. ubi fup. GEOR. SYNCEL. in chronogr. p. 275. POLYB. & DIOD. SIC. ubi fup.

(1) Eutropius intimates, that Hiero concluded a treaty of peace with the Romans in the third year of this war. But the other authors we have cited, or at least the majority and best of them, have placed that treaty in the second campaign, and therefore we have chosen to follow them (11).

(K) According to Servius, this city received its name from one Acesses, a Trojan, whom Æneas left in possession of it at his departure from Sicily. Ennius calls this Acesses Æneas's host, and consequently intimates him to have been one of the Aborigines of Sicily. The inhabitants of it, from their first acquaintance with the Romans, looked upon them as their kindred and relations, and always most heartily espoused their interest. Before that time, it is probable they had an aversion to the Greeks, as being of Trojan extraction; and therefore might very naturally court the affiftance of the Carthaginians on all occasions, as we find sometimes they did. Afterwards, when they became subject to Carthage, they undoubtedly were very faithful to that stare; but, at the commencement of this war, preferred the Romans to that nation, for the reason above affigned. That cities frequently, in antient times, were denominated after great men, is a truth obvious to all persons moderately versed in the knowledge of antiquity (12).

(10) Univ. hist. vol. vi. p. 709. & 710. in not. (N). sub sin. Polyb. l. i. Diod. Sic. l. xxiii. in excerpt. Hæsch. Cic. de divin. l. i. Voss. de hist. Grec. Hendr. in catal. auctor. Vide & Bosium, atq; not. var ad Corn. Nep. de Hannib. p. 604. edic. Lugd. Bat. 1734. (11) Eutrop. l. ii. (12) Virg. Æn v. ver. 718 & Serv. in loc. Cic. in Ver. 4. de sign. c. 33. Ennius apud Lactant. l. i. 6. 22. Dio, l. liv. Vide & Velser. antiquit. l. v.

a one of his Trojan companions, and consequently related to the Romans, opened its gates to the conful, after having massacred the Carthaginian garrison. of Aliena did the like. Hilara, Tyrita, and Afcela, were carried sword in hand. As for the Tyndarites, they proposed submitting upon the first appearance of the Roman army, had they not been prevented by the Carthaginians, who, upon the first intelligence of their design, carried off the principal citizens as hostages, and conveyed all the provisions and military stores in the place to Lilybæum. After this, the confuls retired to Rhegium, where they took up their winter-quarters w.

THE next campaign the Carthaginians appointed Hanno commander in chief of all They defeat the The next campaign the Caribaginians appointed ranno continuated in chief of all Carthaginians, their forces, who made Agrigentum, as being the most commodious for that purpose and take Agrib by its situation, a place of arms, and fixed there his principal magazine. The con-gentum. fuls L. Postbumius Megellus and Q. Mamilius Vitulus, being apprised of this; advanced with a powerful army into the neighbourhood of that city, and, after having blocked it up for some months, besieged it in form. As this siege happened in the middle of harvest, the Carthaginian garrison, observing great numbers of the enemy dispersed in the fields, in order to carry off the corn to their camp, made a vigorous fally, cut many of them to pieces, and had almost forced their intrenchments; but were at last beat back into the town. In the mean time Hannibal, the fon of Gifco, who commanded in the place, finding the Romans to push on the siege with such vigour, that he must be obliged to capitulate, unless speedily relieved, dispatched reiterated c expresses to Carthage, with an account of his distress. Hereupon Hanno received orders to attempt raising the siege; in order to which, he first marched to Heraclea, within twenty miles of Agrigentum, and from thence to Erbessa, where posting himfelf, he so streightened the Roman army, that they were in great danger of perishing for want of provisions, as having no prospect of any supply. The that army at first, according to Diodorus, consisted of an hundred thousand men, most of whom were Sicilians, not a fourth part of them now remained fit for service; and the plague at the same time breaking out amongst them, they found themselves in a very melancholy fituation. This induced the confuls now to think of attacking Hanno, though they had before declined an engagement, when that general had made a motion, as d though he intended to offer them battle, and even defeated their cavalry. Having then plenty of provisions, and being strongly intrenched; they imagined themselves able to starve the garrison to a surrender; and therefore, as their army, through the great fatigues they had undergone during the fiege, was not near so numerous as the 'Carthaginian, they judged it prudent to avoid a battle; but being now reduced to great diffress, they braved the enemy; who, suspecting some ambuscade, did not shew the same disposition to fight. The Romans however reaped considerable advantage from this conduct; for Hiero, finding the Carthaginians superior to his new allies, had delayed supporting them in the manner he was obliged to by the last treaty; whereas at this time, seeing the tables turned, he supplied them in great abundance with all kinds of provisions. Many Sicilian cities likewise, animated by the same event, sent deputations to the Romans, and joined them with a good body of forces. Hanno, observing this, and believing Hannibal, fallying out of the town in the heat of the action, would fall upon the rear of the enemy, advanced some time after into a plain near the Roman camp, and drew up his army in order of battle. In the mean time the Roman generals, by way of precaution, had posted proper detachments to repulse any fally the besieged might make, and, upon Hanno's approach, fent privately another body to attack the Carthaginian rear. As soon as this disposition was made, the Roman army, moving out of their trenches into the plain, faced the enemy, and towards evening a bloody engagement enfued. But the Rof mans behaved with such bravery, that, notwithstanding the obstinate resistance they met with, they carried the day, and intirely routed the Carthaginians, putting to the fword vast numbers of their men, and killing some of their elephants. Hannibal, during the engagement, sallied out with the best part of the garrison; but being repulsed by the troops the consuls had posted at all the avenues to the city, he was obliged to retire with confiderable loss. Immediately afterwards making his escape, he abandoned the place to the Romans; and Hanno fled, with the broken remains of his army, to Heraclea. The fiege of Agrigentum continued feven months, the Romans Ioling thirty thousand foot, and five hundred and forty horse, before the town x.

w Polyb. Diod. Sic. Liv. Oros. & Zonar. ubi sup. Vide & Pomp. Fest. in voc. Segesta. * ZONAR. ubi supra.

Proceedings of the Romans and Cirthagimans in Sacry the beginning o this cam-Laign.

THE Carthaginians, greatly chagrined at the ill success of their arms the preced- a ing campaign, attributed it, as usual, to the bad conduct of their general; and therefore not only exacted an immense sum of money from Hanno; by way of fine, but likewise deprived him of his commission, appointing Hamilear to command the forces in his room. Hannibal, an officer of good repute, took upon him the command of the fleet, and received orders from Hamilear to ravage the coasts of Italy, that he might draw the confuls that way, and, by fuch a diversion, enable the land-forces to attack more successfully the Roman conquests in Sicily. But the Romans had taken fuch care to guard their coasts, by posting detachments in proper places to prevent the enemy from making a descent, that this design was rendered abortive, and the conful C. Duilius landed two legions in Sicily without opposition. Upon his arrival b there, he advanced to Myttistratum (L), and laid siege to that fortress; but, notwithstanding the large train of battering-engines he had with him, was obliged to raise the fiege, and retire with great loss. In the mean time Hamilear, suspecting a body of Gallic mercenaries in his army of a defign to defert to the enemy, because they had lately mutinied for want of their pay, commanded them to ftorm a town defended by a Roman garrison, of which, by means of his spies, he gave the Romans private intelligence, that they might receive them in a proper manner. The Romans, thus informed of their approach, laid an ambuscade for the Gauls; into which falling, and not being supported by Hamilear, they were all cut off to a man. Frontinus seems to relate this event differently, intimating, that the Gauls, amounting to four thou-c fand men, were fent to pillage the country, and that they fold their lives at a dear The conful, being ignorant of Hamilear's view in this point of conduct, looked upon the action as a fignal advantage gained over the enemy, and, animated thereby, made preparations with great vigour for a fresh attack upon the Carthaginian territories. But the Romans receiving now a blow by sea, he was recalled to command the fleet, and consequently, for some time, obliged to suspend the operations by land v.

Booles takes tura, beat Hannibal, the Carthaginian

THE Romans, observing that the coasts of Italy lay exposed to the depredations of a Roman squa the Carthaginian fleets, which made frequent descents upon them, whilst Africa enjoyed all the fweets of peace, were refolved to attack the enemy in the most sensible mans, in their part, and, in order to this, to equip a fleet capable of coping with any the Cartha- d ginians could fit out against them. This was a bold undertaking in a nation, who were almost totally ignorant of sea affairs, and such a strange phænomenon, that it induced Polybius, according to his own relation, to write the history of the first Punic war. We shall therefore make it our business here to touch upon all the most material circumstances relative to such an extraordinary attempt, that have hitherto escaped us. Hannibal, the Carthaginian admiral, being desirous of destroying the Roman navy in its infancy, by his emiffaries found means to decoy Cneius, or, as Polybius calls him, Caius Cornelius Scipio, with feventeen new-built galleys, to the port Upon his arrival there, the Carthaginians, who had fent before a squadron into that harbour under the command of Boodes, begged for peace in the most suppliant e manner, pretending to fubmit to whatever conditions the Romans should think fit to impose upon them. At the same time they acquainted him, that the Carthaginian commodore was so extremely indisposed, that he could not possibly come on board his galley, or that otherwise he would have waited upon him, and made the overture in person; and therefore intreated him to honour Boodes with his company, in order to fettle a firm and lasting peace between the two nations. The credulous Roman, giving ear to this proposal, was detained prisoner by the persidious Carthaginian, and his whole squadron taken after a faint resistance. This Roman squadron was fent from the rest of the ships to Messana, to reconnoitre the coasts, and give directions there for the reception and security of the grand sleet; of which Hannibal, f who was then at Panormus, receiving intelligence, immediately detached twenty the inhabitants of it. Both from the name and the fituation affigued it by fome of the above-mentioned authors, the Sicilian town at present called Mistretta seems to answer to it (13).

y Diod. Sic. & Polyb. ubi supra. Zonar. l. viii. c. 10. Flor. l. ii. c. 2. Liv. in epit. 17. Frontin. ftrat. l. ini. c. 16. ex. 3.

(L) This town Diodorus calls Mystratus, Polybius Myttistratum, Zonaras Mutistratius, Stephanus Byzan-Pliny rinus Amestratus, and Silius Italicus Amastra. mentions the Mutustratini, which were undoubtedly

<sup>(13)</sup> Diod. Sic. l. xxiii. in excerpt. Rhodoman. Polyb. l. i. Zonar. l. viii. c. 11. Steph, Byzant. de urb. in voc. Plin. t. iii. c. 8. Sil. Ital. I. xiv. ver. 267.

a galleys, under the command of Boodes, who made themselves masters of the Roman vessels in the manner above-mentioned. Zonaras tells us, that the Carthaginian commodore at first made the proper dispositions to attack the Romans; but finding them in a posture to give him a warm reception, he judged it more convenient to have recourse to the artifice already related. The same author adds, that the legionary tribunes on board the Roman fleet attending the conful, were likewise taken, and all of them fent prisoners to Cartbage; and that, after this, the seventeen galleys surrendered, without striking a stroke. Soon after, Hannibal himself committed great ravages on the coasts of Italy, whither he had advanced at the head of fifty galleys, to take a view of the Roman naval forces there; but was attacked in his turn, lost the b best part of his ships, and with great difficulty made his escape. This something raised the drooping spirits of the Romans, who were not a little dejected at the loss they had before fustained 2.

NOTWITHSTANDING this defeat, the Carthaginians, being one of the most power- Duilins the ful nations of the world by sea, entertained still a very contemptible opinion of the conful gains Roman fleet, which was but in its infancy. The Romans, on the other hand, dreaded signal victory the naval force of the Carthaginians, though they had gained an advantage over Han-over him. nibal, especially as they had lost one of their consuls, who was an able and brave commander. In order therefore to make head against the enemy upon the watery element, the senate ordered the remaining conful, C. Duilius, immediately to leave é Sicily, and take upon him the command of the squadron then in the streights of Rhegium. This he did, and engaging the Carthaginians, by the help of the corvus, a machine which we have already described at large from Polybius, intirely deseated them 2. Some authors intimate, that the manus ferreæ, or barragones, a grappling instrument, were a machine different from the corvi b (M), and of great service to the Romans in this action. Others maintain, that they were the same, or at least, that the former appertained to the latter . For our part, we think it evident from Curtius, Pliny, and others, that the manus ferreæ (N) were more antient than the corvi, and of Tyrian extraction, and confequently known to the "Carthaginians themselves; though at the same time we believe they were much improved by the corvi As the d Roman vessels were vastly inferior to the Carthaginian in lightness and activity, the corvus was invented to remedy that defect. Hannibal, though he performed the part of a gallant commander in this action, was obliged to abandon his septireme, or admiral galley, to the enemy, and got off in a small boat. The rest of the Caribaginian galleys foon after came up with the Romans; but met with the same fate the others had done before. The loss of the Carthaginians in this double engagement is variously related by the Roman historians; but the most authentic account of it is the inscription on the basis of the columna rostrata (O) of Duilius, still preserved at

(M) To what has been already faid of the corvus, we shall only add, that the chevalier Folard has obliged the world with a learned and curious differtation upon it. Dominicus Machaneus, in his scholia upon Cornelius Nepos, likewise has given us a minute description of it, which is extracted chiefly from Polybius. This we mention purely for the take of our curious and inquifitive readers.

à 2

2

1, 15

.

1

(N) Zonaras intimates, that the manus ferrea, or barpagones, were fixed to the ends of long poles, and that with them the Romans grappied and brought-to the enemies ships. Livy gives us much the same account of them, and tells us, that the Carthaginians likewise made use of them in their naval engagements with the Romans; which seems a sufficient proof, that they were not the corvus, fince this was invented by Duilius. Scheffer thinks, that these manus ferree, or harpagones, were iron hooks fixed in the heads of poles, which, by the affiltance of a chain fastened to the mast, were thrown down with great force upon the enemies vessels; which they penetrated in such a manner, that nothing could disengage them; so that they hoisted them up into the air, and then dashed them upon the water with so great violence, that they were frequently sunk. The Greeks called this machine agrayn, according to Helychius (14).

(O) The naves rostrate, from whence Duilius's pillar was called columna rostrata, were vessels to denominated from the Latin word roftra, tignifying the beaks of ships. These beaks, in figure resembling those of birds, consisted of brass, and served not only to cut the water in failing, but likewise to damage the enemies ships in an engagement. This is not only apparent from the figure of these vessels in the columna rostrata of Duilius, and on antient coins, but likewise from Diodorus Siculus and Polybius. The Romans and Carthaginians both DIOD. Sic. Liv. Polyb. & Zonar. ubi sup. Polyen. strat. l. vi. c. 16. ex. 5. Vide & Ennium in annal. 6, 7. cum not. Hieron. Column. accurant. Hessel. Amst. 1707. * POLYB. LIV. & FLOR. ubi fup. Zonar. l. viii. c. 11. Luc. Ampel. in lib. memorial. c. 46. Aurel. Vict. five auct. vir. vir. illust. 38. Eutrop. l. ii. b Plin. l. vii. c. 56. Curt. l. iv. pass. Vide & Freinshem. in Flor. l. ii. c. 2. atq. Liv. l. xxx. c. 10. c Flor. & auct vit. vir. illust. ubi sup. S. Jul. Frontin. l. ii. c. 3. ex. 24. d Liv. ubi sup. Vide & Scheffer. in Mil. nav. l. xi. c. 7.

Rome, and which may be seen in a former part of this work. As for Hannibal, hav- a ing before fled from Agrigentum, he would most certainly have been crucified upon his arrival at Carthage, had he not, by an instance of Punic subtilty, avoided the impending danger. However, the senate thought proper to remove him from the command of the sea-forces. This we learn from Orosius and Zonaras; but, according to Polybius, he was continued in that post, and the same campaign crucified by his own men, upon their receiving another difgrace from the Romans .

culians, and

FORTUNE however did not intirely abandon the Carthaginians. Their arms in prifes the Syra- Sicily were attended with a good run of success after the departure of Duilius; for reduces several though the Romans, in consequence of their late victory, obliged the Carthaginians towns in Sicily. to raise the siege of Segesta, which a body of their troops had formed, and carried by the town of Macella by affault; yet Hamilear, whose head-quarters were then at Panormus, only waited for a favourable opportunity to attack them. In the mean time a dispute arose in the Roman camp between the auxiliary troops and the legionaries, which came to such a height, that a separation seemed inevitable, the former having actually marked out a camp for themselves between Paropus and Therma (P). A general much less vigilant than Hamilear, would naturally have taken advantage of fuch a diffension; the Carthaginians therefore, surprising them near the spot of ground they had chosen to encamp upon, before they could intrench themselves, put four thousand, according to Polybius, or, as Diodorus will have it, six thousand, of them to the sword, and dispersed the rest. After this blow, Hamilear made himself c master of Camarina and Enna, and fortified Drepanum, surrounding it with a wall. Here he likewise deposited the most valuable part of his baggage, and other effects. Then advancing to Eryx, he almost razed that antient city, leaving only a small part of it standing to cover the famous temple of Venus Erycina, supposed to have been built by Aneas; and carried the inhabitants to Drepanum. This he did to prevent the Romans from taking post in that fortress, in case the citizens should be disposed to invite them thither. In short, he reduced many cities, partly by force, and partly by treachery; and had made himself master of the whole island, had not Florus, the Roman general, after Duilius was gone to Rome, behaved with great vigilance and bravery. However, this success was not lasting, as we shall see immediately f.

Hannibal furprised by the Romans, and crucified by his own men.

Hannibal, according to Polybius, after the defeat off of Myla, returned to Carthage; where being reinforced by a good number of galleys, and attended by many officers of great merit, he put to sea again, steering his course for the coast of Sardinia. He had not been long in one of the harbours of that illand, probably Calaris, now Cagliari, but he was surprised by the Romans, who carried off many of his ships, and took great numbers of his men prisoners. This so incensed the rest, that they feized their admiral, and crucified him; but who was his immediate fucceffor, The Romans however reaped no other advantage from this action, does not appear. than shewing their activity, encouraging their allies, and a little diminishing the naval power of their rival. Had Hannibal escaped death for the present, it is pro- e bable he would have met with it at Carthage; fince it was looked upon there as the highest crime in a general to be unsuccessful. Nothing surther material happened either this campaign, or the following, if we will give credit to Polybius 8.

* Aurel. Vict. & Zonar. ubi sup. Polyb. ubi sup. Univers. hist. vol. iv. p. 654. not. (F). Diod. c. l. xxiii. in excerpt. Hoeschel. F Diod. Sic. & Polyb. ubi sup. F Polyb. & Zonar. ubi supra. Sic. l. xxiii. in excerpt. Hoeschel.

made use of such vessels. It is likely they were of eastern extraction. The Carthaginians, as Silius feems to intimate, had them from their ancestors the Tyrians, and they from the Sidonians (15).

(P) Salmasius, depending upon the authority of Mela, Pliny, and Strabo, places the city here mentioned by Diodorus in the fouthern, or rather fouthwestern part of the island, in the neighbourhood of Selinus. Belides this, there was another of the same name, founded by the Carthaginians upon the ruins of Himera, which we have already given a description of. That the Termini of the modern Sicilians stands upon the same spot of ground, which the antient Therma Himerenfes, or, as Diodorus calls it, Therma, occupied, is evident from Gruter and Marius Aretius. Cicero likewise, and Pindar's scho-liast, both take notice of this last city; which we could not intirely pass over in silence, as being of Carthaginian extraction (16).

(15) Isidor, l. xix, c. 1. Diod. Sic. l. xiv. Polyb. l. i. c. 50. Sil. Italic. l. xiv. (16) Strab. l. vi. p. 189. P. Mel. l. ii. c. 7. Plin l. iii. c. 8. Salmas, in Solin. c. 5. p. 80. Cic. in Ver. ii. c. 35. Schol. in Pind. Olymp. xvii. sub sin. Diod. Sic. l. xiii. Marius Aretius in chorograph. Sicil. & inscript. apud Gruter. p. 433 n. 6. Apollodor, apud Strab. ubi sup. p. 188. Thucyd. l. vi. sub init.

Towards the close of the following campaign, Hamilton put his troops into The progress of winter-quarters at Panormus, posting proper detachments at the principal avenues to the Romans in the city, to prevent a surprize. In the mean time C. Aquilius Florus, the Roman general, having received a reinforcement, advanced into the neighbourhood of Panormus, and offered the enemy battle; but finding that they would not flir out of the town, and that he was not strong enough to undertake the siege of the place, especially as the season was so far advanced, he moved with his army to Hippana, and took it by affault. From thence he marched to Myttislratum, a fortress which the Romans had twice ineffectually belieged, and fat down before it. Florus here made his approaches fo flowly, either through the bad disposition of the ground, or b the bravery of the Carthaginian garrison, that he could not reduce the city before the expiration of his office. However, early the next spring, his successor, A. Attilius Collatinus, or, as Zonaras calls him, A. Attilius Latinus, joining the army before Myttistratum with a strong body of forces, pushed on the siege with such vigour, that the Carthaginian garrifon abandoned the town in the night, and the wives and children of the citizens, by their outcries and lamentations, obliged them to open the gates to the Romans. The foldiers, enraged at the obstinate defence they had made, and their attachment to the Carthaginians, at first put all they met, without diffinction, to the fword; but the conful causing a proclamation to be made, that every Roman foldier should possess all the persons and effects of those he took prisonc ers, the slaughter ceased. However, the city itself was levelled with the ground, and the remaining part of the inhabitants fold for flaves. The conful next attacked Camarina, and, in his march thither, was near being cut off, with his whole army, by a stratagem of Hamilear, as has been already related; but found it so strong, and defended by fo numerous a garrifon, that he could not make himself master of it, till he received a large train of battering-engines, and other supplies, from king Hiero. After these arrived, the Romans soon carried the town, and treated the inhabitants in the same manner they had done those of Myttistratum. The consul afterwards seized upon Enna by treachery, and massacred the Carthaginian garrison. Sittana he took by storm; and Camicus, a castle belonging to the Agrigentines, was betrayed to him. d Other places, of less importance, surrendered of course; so that the Carthaginians began to lofe ground confiderably, notwithstanding their late successes. The Romans, looking upon Camicus as a post of consequence, left a considerable party of men to defend it; and having possessed themselves of Erbessus, which was deserted by its inhabitants, made preparations to fit down before Lipara with all their forces h.

In the mean time L. Cornelius Scipio, Florus's collegue, sailed, with the squa- As likewife in dron under his command, towards Sardinia and Corsica, two islands in the Tyrrhenian Sardinia and fea, subject to Carthage, and so near one another, that, at a great distance, they seemed to be but one island. The consul first made a descent in Corsica, and took Aleria, or, as Zonaras calls it, Valeria, by storm; upon (Q) which the other towns submitted, h Polyb, ubi sup. Zonar. l. viii. c. 11. p. 387. Diod. Sic. l. xxiii. in excerpt. Rhodoman. Aurel. Vict. sive auct. vit. vir. illustr. in Attil. Collatin. 38. Liv. epst. l. xvii. Eutrop. l. ii. Oros. l. iv. c. 7.

(Q) About the year 1615. a stone was dug up near the Porta Capena in Rome, with the following inscription upon it, commemorating the event here mentioned. This stone is five palms four inches long, and two palms ten inches broad.

HONCOINO. PIOIRVME. COSENTIONT. R DVONORO. OPTVMO. FVISE. VIRO LYCIOM. JCIPIONE. FILIOJ: BARBATI CONSON CENSOR AIDINS. HIC. FVET.A HEC.CEPIT.CORSICA.AVERIAQVE.VRBE DEDET. TEMPESTATEBYS: AIDE MERETO

Hunc plurimi confentiunt Roma Bonorum optimum fuisse virum LUCIUM SCIPIONEM. Filius Barbati, Consul, censor, adilis hic fuit. Hic cepit Corsicam, Aleriamque urbem; Dedit Tempestatibus adem merito.

Most people agree, that of all the good men in Rome this Lucius Scipio was the best. He was the son of Vol. VI. No 11. Scipio surnamed Barbatus, as likewise consul, censor, and adile. He took the city of Aleria, and conquered Cortica; and built a temple for the Tempests, as he had great reason to do.

From this most remarkable inscription, which, in point of antiquity, is scarce inferior to that on the base of the columna rostrata of Duilius, tince the action here referred to happened in the year of Rome 494. the year after Duilius got his naval victory, may be drawn the following observations:

1. That the L. Scipio mentioned here was not the

L. Scipio said by Livy to have been made consul in Etruria, but another, the son of Barbatus, who fubdued Corsica, A. U. C. 494.

2. That he was the same person with him, who, according to the Capitoline Tables, triumphed over the Corsi, Sardi, and Carthaginians.

That either the MSS. of Livy, or the Fasti Capitolini, must be out, when the first affirm, that Scipio Barbatus's prænomen was Publius, and the last, that Lucius Scipio, who triumphed over the that being the only place of strength in the whole island. As the Carthaginians had a a strong fleet of galleys on the coast of Sardinia, they were in no great pain for that Upon Scipio's moving that way, they detached one part of it to reconnoitre him; which immediately retired upon his approach. But, upon his entering the port of Olbia, the appearance of the whole Carthaginian squadron, then riding at anchor there, was so terrible, that he thought proper to sheer off, without putting his defign in execution. A further inducement to him not to undertake the conquest of Sardinia at this present juncture, was his not having a sufficient body of legionaries on board to attack the Carthaginians by land. As he had not received proper intelligence of the enemy's strength on that side, he had not taken the necessary measures to render that expedition successful, and therefore found himself obliged to retreat in a precipitate manner; but some authors give us to understand, that soon after, hav- b ing been furnished with a larger body of land-forces, he returned, and (R) reduced Olbia. Other places of less note, upon the reduction of that town, fell to him; but he could not make himself master of the whole island. However, according to Eutropius, he carried off with him a vast number both of the Corst and Sardi prisoners.

The Romans, give the Car-

Hamilear being informed the year following, that the Romans had a delign upon by a stratagem, Lipara, threw a body of forces into that town by night, unknown to the consul. This was done in so private and unexpected a manner, that the citizens, though blow in Sardi- strongly inclined to the Romans, found themselves incapable of making any resist-The conful, arriving before the place, made a vigorous attack; but was repulsed by Hamilear, at the head of the garrison, with the slaughter of a great c number of men. At the same time Sulpicius, who then acted as admiral, after having hovered several days about the coast of Sardinia, made a descent there, and completed the reduction of that island. According to Florus, by razing the city of Caralis, or Carala, the capital of the island, he so terrified the Sardi, that they sub-

POLYB. LIV. ZONAR. ubi fup: FLOR. l. ii. c. 2. OROS. l. iv. c. 7. EUTROP. l. ii. Univ. hift. vol. iv. p. 660.

Corfi, Sardi, and Carthaginians, at the time aforefaid, was the son of L. Scipio.

- 4. That a vacancy or hiatus in the Capitoline Tables may be from hence supplied; since from the inscription it appears, that this L. Scipio must have been, in all probability, Duilius's collegue in the cenforship A. U. C. 495. From whence it follows, that Onuphrius Panvinius is guilty of a mistake, when he makes Cn. Scipio Asima to have been Duilius's collegue in the censorship the year above-
- 5. That a passage in Ovid may be hereby explained, which, before the discovery of this inscription, was not understood:

Te quoque, Tempestas, meritam delubra fatemur, Cum pæne est Cossis obruta classis aquis.

Some authors imagined this to point at the tempest Claudius Nero the consul met with in the year of Rome 551. in which, according to Livy, his fleet was near being destroyed; others, to one that attacked Marcellus; and lastly, others, to one in which Metellus's squadron was almost lost; whereas it undoubtedly alludes to one, that L. Scipio, at the time we are speaking of, met with on the coast of Corfice, wherein he very narrowly escaped destruction.

6. That of course L. Scipio was attacked by such a tempest on the coast of Corfica, in which his whole fleet was in the most imminent danger of being lost; and that, upon account of his deliverance therefrom, he built a temple, which he dedicated to the Tempests, i. e. to the deities presiding ever them.

7. That the Romans looked upon tempests as deities, or at least imagined they had deities presiding over them, and therefore paid them divine ho-

8. That the name of the principal fortress in Corfica was Aleria, and not Valeria, as we find it in all the MSS. of Zonaras; and that therefore these MSS. may be emended by this inscription.

9. That many observations relating to the antient language of the Romans and Latins, laid down by Festus, Quintilian, and others, are confirmed by the words it contains.

10. That, in antient times, some letters of the Roman and Latin alphabet, at least, were borrowed from the Estruscans, since I and S apparently belong to that nation; at least, that the Estruscans had letters in their alphabet, which, in figure, corresponded with some of the Roman and Latin letters. This is confirmed by the legends on feveral confular coins.

Many other conclusions might be drawn from hence, which we have not time at prefent to touch upon. It is not improbable, that the stone, on which this inscription was found, belonged to Scipio's tomb, and that he was buried not far from the Porta Capena (17).

(R) Hanno, who had behaved with fo much bravery in Sicily, commanded in Olbia, and was killed in one of the attacks. We must own ourselves guilty of a mistake in a former part of this work, when we cite Valerius Maximus to prove, that the Roman conful honoured Hanno's body with a noble funeral; fince that author, in the place referred to, speaks of Hannibal in the second Punic war, who shewed great humanity on such an occasion to the body of Tiberius Gracchus (18).

(17) Liv. l. x. l. xxx. & alib. pass. Ovid. fast. l. vi. Fest. Pomp. in voc. Duonum, & voc. Topper, ut & Carm. Saliar. in qu. videre est Duonus Cerusus, i. e. Bonus Creator. M. Fab. Quinctil. l. i. c. 4. & 7. l. 1x. c. 4. & alib. Vide & fos. Scalig. in Sext. Pomp. Fest. lib. de verb. sign. castigat. p. 209, 210. Tab; Eugubin. 1. 2, 3, 4, 5. apud Dempst. de Etrur. regal. vol. 1. edit. Florent. 1723. Phil. Bonarot. ad monum. Etrusc. op. Dempst. addit. explic. & conject. sect. 41. p. 85–88. ed. Florent. 1726. Anion. Fran. Gorii museum Etruscum, pass. ed. Florent. 1737. (18) Univers. hist. vol. iv. p. 660. Val. Max. l. v. c. 1.

mitted

a mitted to him. Zonaras informs us, that the contrary winds prevented an engagement between Sulpicius and the Carthaginians; but that afterwards Attilius, who commanded the land-forces, found an opportunity of impoling upon the Carthaginian admiral, by means of some deserters, whom he bribed to assure him, that the Romans intended to land in Africa. Upon this, according to the same author, the Carthaginian squadron, having been before driven by stress of weather into one of the ports of Sardinia, loofed immediately, though in the night, and fet fail for Africa; but were attacked by Sulpicius, who, being apprised of the intelligence given them, had posted himself in a proper place to intercept them, and either took or funk, by favour of the night, most of their ships. The good success of this strab tagem encouraged the Romans now in good earnest to prepare for an expedition to Africa, as the only means to oblige the enemy to evacuate Sicily, and procure them a peace upon their own terms k (S).

THE next year, from Zonaras it feems probable, that the Roman forces in Sicily, The Romans under the command of A. Attilius Collatinus, or, as Livy will have it, Calatinus, and Carthagiwho, on account of his great fervices, was continued general there, with the title of meet with disproconful, besieged Lipara a second time, though they had been routed by the Car-assers in this thaginians towards the close of the last campaign. C. Attilius Regulus, one of the new maritime war. confuls, who had the command of the fleet allotted to him, had two naval engagements with the enemy off the coasts of Sicily, in the first of which he lost nine galleys; c but in the other routed the Carthaginian squadron, sinking ten, and taking eight of their vessels, with all their crews. The other consul, about the same time, laid waste the island of Malta; which is a good proof, that the Carthaginians were then in possession of it. These advantages still farther excited the Romans to attack the African republic in the very heart of its dominions '.

As neither of the late actions had been decisive, both parties made such vast and They both preexpeditious preparations, that the ensuing summer, the ninth year of this war, they pare for a dehad collected their whole naval force, in order to determine the fate of Sicily, as well cifrue engageas the dominion of the sea, and, in consequence thereof, that of Carthage itself. ment. The confuls, L. Manlius Vulso and C. Attilius Regulus, who were elected purely on d account of their distinguished merit, with the Roman sleet under their command, confisting of three hundred and thirty galleys of different sizes, had their rendezvous at Messana. From thence, stretching their line along the coast towards cape Pachynum, after having doubled that cape, they failed directly to Ecnomos, where they took their land-forces on board. About the fame time the Carthaginian squadron, composed of three hundred and fifty sail, arrived at Lilybaum, the only place they had left in Sicily, except Panormus, and a few towns of less note in that neighbourhood. They did not stay long here, but, pursuing their projected course, took up their station at Heraclea Minoa, where they made the necessary dispositions to give the enemy battle m.

THE Romans, in order either to engage the enemy by sea, or make a descent upon The disposition their territories in Africa, had taken care to put on board the galleys the very flower of their fleets. of their land-forces. The grand fquadron confifted of four divisions, the first of which was called the first legion, and the first fleet; the second and third in like manner received a denomination from their order; but the fourth went by the name of triarians,

* Zonar, ubi sup. c. 12, 13. Polyb. Liv. & Flor. ubi sup. 1 Polyb. Liv. Ros. ubi sup. 2 Polyb. & Eutrop. ubi sup. Dio Cass. in excerptis Valessi. 1 POLYB. LIV. ZONAR, DIOD. SIC.

(S) Zonaras and Orofius make Hannibal to have been the Carthaginian admiral at this time, and, if we remember right, are the only authors who tell us, that he had his commission taken from him for the ill success he met with in his engagement with Duilius. Aurelius Victor indeed agrees with them in relation to Hannibal's escaping punishment by a stratagem; but says not a word of his being deprived of his command. Zonaras and Orosius therefore being modern, in comparison of Polybius, whom they contradict in this particular, and unsupported by any antient writer in what they advance as to the point before us, we have chosen to follow the last historian, when he affirms, that Hannibal was continued in his command of the fleet, and crucified foon after by his own men. Besides, it seems improbable, that, if he had been discarded on account of his ill conduct, or ill fuccess, which the superstitious Carthaginians looked upon as very ominous, the senate of Carthage should have afterwards employed him, especially as they might naturally have some apprehensions of his conduct's being influenced by his resentment. Zonaras and Orosius therefore ought to give way to Polybius in the present case. Orosius intimates, that he was stoned to death by his troops (19).

(19) Aurel. Vict. five auct. vir. vir. illustr. in Duil. 37. Polyb. l. i. 👉 Zonar, in loc. citat. Oros. l. iv. Vide Liv. epis. l. xvii. aliofq; Roman, historic.

a term peculiarly applied to a certain order of foldiers, who were always the choicest a troops, and formed the corps de reserve amongst the Romans. Each galley contained three hundred rowers, and an hundred and twenty foldiers; fo that the whole united force on board amounted to near an hundred and forty thousand men. The first division was posted on the right, the second on the left, and the third in the rear of the other two, in such a manner, as with them to form a triangle, the vertex of which was the two admiral-galleys, wherein were the two confuls, placed in the front of their respective squadrons. The triarians were drawn up in the rear of the whole fleet, parallel to the third legion, the base of the aforesaid triangle, but extended beyond the two angles there. The transports, with the horses and baggage on board, lay between the two last-mentioned lines, that is, between the third divifion and the triarians, this being judged the best situation for them to be covered from any irruptions of the enemy. The combined naval and land-force of the Carthaginians must, according to Polybius, have exceeded that of the Romans; since he feems to infinuate, that their troops, including the feamen, could not have been less than an hundred and fifty thousand strong. When the Carthaginians had observed the disposition of the Roman squadron, they immediately ranged their own in order of battle. They divided it into four smaller squadrons, which they drew up The three first divisions, posted to the right, stretched out far into the sea, as though they had an intention to surround the Romans, pointing their prows directly upon them; the fourth, lying to the left, kept close under the shore, e being disposed in the form of an outwork or tenaille. Hanno, who had met with fuch bad success at Agrigentum, commanded on the right with the light vessels, that could attack and retreat with great swiftness, and row nimbly round the galleys of the Romans. Hamilcar, the Carthaginian admiral in the late action off of Tyndaris, had the left wing committed to his conduct, who, though he had the misfortune to be defeated, gave sufficient proofs of his merit and experience in this engagement ".

The Carthaginians intirely defeated.

THE conful, observing the Carthaginian line to be very thin in the middle, caused it to be vigorously attacked in that part by their first and second divisions. The Carthaginians, at the first onset, pursuant to the orders received from Hamilear, retired with precipitation, hoping by this means to separate that part of the Roman fleer, a with which they were engaged, from the other, not doubting but the Romans would pursue them with great ardor, and thereby give the gross of their fleet an opportunity of charging the remaining Roman divisions with great advantage. Accordingly the Romans, by their eagerness in the pursuit, left their comrades exposed to the efforts of the enemy. The Carthaginians, that fled, perceiving this, immediately, upon a fignal given from Hamilcar's galley, tacked about, and, with great bravery, made head against their pursuers; but, after a warm dispute, the Romans, notwithstanding the lightness and activity of the Cartbaginian vessels, by the assistance of their corvi, and other grappling instruments, coming to a close engagement with them, and being animated by the example of their officers, who exposed themselves e as much as the meanest foldiers, worsted the enemy, obliging them to sheer off. In the mean time Hanno fell with great fury upon the triarians, whilst that part of the Carthaginian squadron posted on the left under the shore, attacked the transports and the third legion. Here were three sea-fights at once, which continued for some hours with a vast effusion of blood. In fine, Hanno on one side, and the fourth Carthaginian division on the other, reduced the triarians, transports and third legion, to the last extremity, forced many of them on shore, and had totally ruined them, had they not been kept in awe by the corvi. But at last Manlius returning from the chace of the Carthaginian squadron already routed, and Regulus, with the second legion, advancing to the relief of the triarians, the enemy were intirely defeated. f The Romans lost only twenty-four galleys in this action; but the Carthaginians had thirty funk, and fixty-three taken by the victors. After this battle, which happened off of Heraclea Minoa, Hamilcar sent Hanno to make proposals of peace to the Romans, chiefly with a design to amuse the consuls, and divert them from the African expedition they had in view. But the Romans rejecting these proposals, the war continued with as much fierceness as ever; and the confuls, soon after setting fail for Africa with their whole fleet, and a powerful army on board, landed at Clypea without opposition °.

n Polys. & Zonar. in annal. ubi sup. ubi sup. Oros. l. iv. c. 7.

· POLYB. LIV. FLOR. EUTROP. ZONAR. LUCIUS AMPEL.

$ 8

d أيذ

grij.

; je

the

Š

-3

c booty got in this expedition P.

No words can express the consternation the Carthaginians were in, upon advice The Romans of the Roman army's landing in Africa. They very well knew, that the confuls commit great might march to Carthage without any obstruction, and lay waste all the sertile coun-Atrica. try as they advanced, which could not but reduce them to the greatest streights. Zonaras tells us, that the inhabitants of Clypea or Clupea were feized with fuch impresfions of terror, that they abandoned the city at the approach of the Romans; but, according to Polybius, it stood a siege, though the Carthaginians not being in a condition to relieve it, the confuls, without much bloodshed, made themselves masters of it. Appian represents the Roman navy employed in this invasion as very formidable, telling us, that it included no less than three hundred and fifty fail. From b cape Hermea, where it lay for a short time, it coassed along to Clypea, or, as the Greeks call it, Aspis, where there was a very commodious harbour. The Romans. having left a strong garrison in the place, to secure their shipping, and keep the adjacent territory in awe, moved with the rest of their army nearer Carthage, and reduced a great number of towns, partly by force, and partly by composition. They likewise plundered an infinity of villages, laid vast numbers of noblemens seats in ashes, took above twenty thousand (Eutropius says twenty-seven thousand) prisoners, amongst whom were many Romans, that had fallen into the enemy's hands since the beginning of this war, with feveral deferters; and having scoured all the country almost to the gates of Carthage, they returned to Clypea, loaden with the immense

THE Carthaginians, foon after, receiving intelligence, that Manlius was fet out for Regulus ad-Rome with the best part of the troops, and had left Regulus with only forty ships, vances towards fifteen thousand foot, and five hundred horse, to carry on the war in Africa, began to recover from the terrible fright they were thrown into by the first news of this invalion, and therefore instantly set about making the proper dispositions for their They appointed Hanno, the fon of Afdrubal, and Bostar, generals of their forces, and dispatched an express to Hamilear, then at Heraclea, to return home with all expedition. Hamilear, in a short time, arrived at Carthage, with a reinforcement of five thousand foot, and five hundred horse, and was joined with Asdrubal d and Bostar in the command of the army. The first object of their consultations was, how to prevent the incursions of the Romans at least, if not to dislodge them from the province, wherein the capital of Africa was feated. On the other hand, Regulus, who had taken up his winter-quarters at Clypea, committed great ravages along the fea-coasts, and even penetrated into the very heart of the country; but hearing that the Carthaginian army was in motion, he likewise made a movement with his forces, and encamped upon the Bagrada, in the neighbourhood of Carthage. Here with his battering-engines he flew a ferpent of a monstrous fize, which, if Ælius Tubero may be believed, found the whole Roman army for some time in employ. The Roman historians have undoubtedly given us an hyperbolic description of this monster, and the effects it produced; but considering that a Livy, Valerius Maximus, e Elius Tubero, Pliny, Zonaras, and others, agree in the main in their accounts of it, we cannot help thinking, that a ferpent of an enormous fize the Romans really killed at the place where they were now encamped, especially since dragons or serpents immensely large were pretty common in Mauritania, Numidia, Libya, Ethiopia, &c. and (T) fince it appears from Megasthenes and others, that various instances of furprifingly huge animals of the serpentine kind might be drawn from antiquity.

Hamilcar

P Idem ibid. & Eutrop. ubi sup. Appian. in Libyc. sub init. Paul. Oros. l. iv. 9 Liv. epit. l. xviii. Val. Max. l. i. c. 8. Æl. Tuber. apud Aul. Gell. in noct. Attic. l. vi. c. 3. Plin. nat. hist. l. viii. c. 14. Zonar. ubi sup. c. 13. Senec. de clement. l. i. c. 25. Flor. ubi sup. r Megasth. apud Plin. in loc. jam citat. Plut. in parallel. Propert. eleg. viii. ver. 4. Onesicrit. Astyp. apud Strab. l. xv. Agath. Chip. de mar. Rubr. l. v. apud Phot. in biblioth. c. 250. p. 583. ed. Rothom. 1653. GEOR. CEDREN. hist. compend. p. 153.

(T) In proof of what is here advanced, many authors might be produced. Megasihenes says, that in India there were serpents or dragons, which could swallow at once a stag, or a bull. Metrodorus affirms, that near the river Rhyndacus in Pontus they were so large, that they could seize upon birds flying at a great height over their heads, and devour them. Pliny relates, that a certain species of this animal, called los or bois, were of such a magni-Vol. VI. No 11.

tude, that a whole child had been found in the flomach of one of them, in the reign of the emperor Claudius; and that at first they lived upon cows milk, from whence they derived their name. Seneca, a very grave author, intimates, that the ferpent here mentioned infected the river for a vast distance, destroyed the country all round, and burnt many of the soldiers to death with his breath. Plutarch tells us of a monstrous serpent or dragon, 10 D

And defeats the

Hamilear and his collegues, receiving advice of the Roman general's approach, a Carthaginians and of his having formed the siege of Adis, or Adda, a fortress of great consequence to Carthage, advanced at the head of their forces to attack him. Upon their arrival in the neighbourhood of Adda, they encamped upon some heights covered with woods, which was a capital error, and occasioned the defeat of their army; for by neglecting the plains, and taking post in rough and inaccessible places, they rendered their elephants and cavalry, in which their principal strength consisted, incapable of The Romans, taking advantage of this mistake, did not give them time to rectify it, but immediately fell upon them with the utmost fury. The attack, which happened in the night, was so sudden and unexpected, that many of the Carthaginians had their throats cut in bed, and others lost their lives before they could b lay hold of their arms to defend themselves. However, the mercenaries in the Carthaginian service behaved with great bravery, and not only repulsed the first legion, but forced them to fly to their camp. But Regulus having, at the beginning of the action, ordered a detachment to wheel about, and attack the enemy's rear, they were hereby thrown into confusion, and at last forced to abandon their camp. A great part of the infantry perished, the Romans very closely pursuing them, and having guarded many of the defiles through which they must pass; but most of the elephants and cavalry made their escape. The Cartbaginians lost seventeen thousand, or, according to Eutropius, eighteen thousand, men in the battle and pursuit; eighteen elephants were taken; five thousand men made prisoners, and the rest dispersed. Regulus, after c this action, continued his devastations as before, burnt all the open places, and reduced the fortified towns. Some authors assure us, that he took above two hundred cities; but as this account seems rather to refer to the whole number of places plundered or reduced fince the first descent, we shall chuse to follow Eutropius, who tells us, that the conful conquered seventy-three cities. Utica, amongst the rest, was forced to submit, and Tunis, within nine miles of Caribage, soon met with the same sate. In short, nothing now remained but to lay siege to Carthage itself.

The Numidians declare against the Carthaginians.

To complete the misfortunes of the Carthaginians, the Numidians, a fort of Tartars, or at least in their manners and way of life something resembling that people, entered the territories of Carthage, where they committed dreadful devastations, d This drove most of the Carthaginian subjects into Carthage, which, by this means, was filled with fuch numbers of people, that a famine feemed inevitable, especially as the produce of the earth had been, in a great measure, destroyed, partly by Regulus, and partly by the aforesaid Numidians t.

Regulus makes peace to the Carthag nians; but they are rejected.

THE African nations likewise more immediately subject to Carthage, being weary proposals for a of the Carthaginian yoke, declared for the Romans, who now carried every thing before them. This induced Regulus to imagine, that the Carthaginians would conclude a peace with him upon any, even the most dishonourable terms. He therefore, according to Polybius, offered to treat with them about a peace, being afraid, that his successor would rob him of the glory he had acquired, by putting an end to e the present war, though Zonaras tells us, that the Carthaginians themselves made the

> POLYB. APPIAN. ZONAR. EUTROP. FLOR. AUREL. VICT. OROS. ubi sup. which was brought up by a virgin at Lanuvium; and on some old Roman denarii, we find this virgin represented as bringing him meat, with a basket hanging by her fide. Agatharchides Cnidius, in Photius, mentions serpents of various kinds of an enormous fize common in Ethiopia, and afferts, that he himself saw one thirty cubits long. One suritus Asypalaus, in Strabo, informs us, that Abisarus, an Indian prince, kept two dragons or serpents, one of which was an hundred and forty cubits long, and the other eighty; which Alexander greatly desired to see. Herodocus tells us, that serpents of a size exceeding all belief, were found upon the banks of the Triton, a river bordering on the territory of Car-thage. Isidore, Avicenna, Philostrasus, Solinus, Nicephorus Callistus, Lucian, Arrian, Strabo, Pliny, Atius, Leo Africanus, and others, affirm, that serpents of an immense size were produced in Mauritania, Libya, and Ethiopia. Our philosophical transactions supply us with instances of rattle-snakes prodigiously large, which countenances, in some measure, what the Roman historians have related about the serpent we are discoursing of. Landolphas and father Lobe likewife, in their accounts of Ethiopia, add some weight to what is here advanced, as we shall see, when we come to the history of that country. It has been imagined by fome, that the animal Regulus killed was a crocodile; but the manner in which this was flain, which has been minutely described by Orolius, as well as the express testimony of many Roman authors to the contrary, will not permit us to come into this opinion. Besides, it does not appear from antient history, that the river Bagrada, or indeed any part of Africa Propria, was formerly infested by crocodiles; nor, from the relations of modern travellers, that they are observed in the kingdom of Tanis at this day (20).

t POLYB. & OROS. ubi fup.

(20) Vide auctor jam citat. & Herodot. l. iv. c. 191. Elian, in hift, anim. pass. Isider. Avicen. Philostr. Solin. Nicephor. Callist. Strab. Arrian. in peripl. Lucian. Atium, Oros. Leon. African. Augustin. tom. viii. enarrat. in pfal. cxlviii. aliofq; plurim.

a first overtures. Be that as it will, the terms Regulus prescribed them seemed so intolerable, and incompatible with their honour, that they were resolved to suffer all extremities, rather than submit to them. As Regulus had met with an uninterrupted course of prosperity from the beginning of his consulship, he set no bounds to his arrogance; and the Romans in general being then of the same disposition, by reason of the great success their arms were attended with both by sea and land, it is no wonder that the Carthaginians should have been treated in so imperious a manner. Regulus wrote to the senate, that the Carthaginians were upon the brink of ruin; and that he had taken care to feal up their gates with fear. All hopes therefore of an accommodation vanishing into smoke, both sides seemed resolved to refer the decision of the points at present in dispute betwixt them to the sword. A certain author tells us, that the whole number of prisoners taken by the Romans, from their first arrival in Africa to this time, including those who fell into their hands in the late battle, amounted to two hundred thousand. All the riches and valuable effects found in the Carthaginian camp after the last action, Regulus sent on board some transports to Rome; and having laid watte all the adjacent country, advanced at the head of his victorious troops to the flagnum or great morals, on which Carthage stood. Here, immediately after the rejection of his above-mentioned proposals, he encamped, resolving without delay to attack the capital of the African republic ".

WHILST matters remained in this melancholy situation, a Carthaginian officer, Xantippus, e who had been fent to Greece, to levy soldiers there, returned home with a body of with a body of Greek mercenaries, confifting chiefly of Lacedamonians. This body was commanded Greek mercenaries, arrives by Xantippus the Lacedæmonian, a person of great bravery and military skill, who at Carthage. had learned the art of war in the school of Sparta, then the most renowned of any in the world, for the famous generals it produced. As foon as he had informed himself wherein the main Arength of the Carthaginian forces lay, and of the circumstances of the late defeat, he openly declared, that it was owing to the falle step taken by their generals in encamping upon hills, where their cavalry and elephants could not act; and that, by an opposite conduct, they might still retrieve their affairs, and drive the enemy out of their dominions. Being prevailed upon by the Carthaginian d senate, people, Hamilear, and all the other officers, to take upon him the command of their forces, he first trained them up in the discipline of his country: exercising them near the city, he drew them up in order of battle; made them advance or retreat upon the first fignal; file off with order and swiftness; in a word, to form all the evolutions and movements of the military art, according to the Lacedamonian manner. As nothing inspires soldiers with a greater degree of courage, than a perfuafion of their general's abilities, the Carthaginian troops, who were before so greatly dispirited, now thought themselves invincible, under the conduct of Xantippus, observing how vastly he excelled their own generals in the military art. As he judged it highly improper to permit their ardor to cool, he drew them up in battalia in a large e plain before the city, and boldly advanced towards the Romans. We have already, in a former part of this work, described the disposition of both armies, and given an account of the principal things that passed betwixt them previous to the engagement, and therefore shall not here repeat what was there said; but only observe, that Xantip/us, being within twelve hundred and fifty paces of the enemy, thought proper to call a council of war, in order to shew a respect and deference to the Carthaginian commanders, by consulting them; and that, all joining unanimously in opinion with him, it was refolved to give the enemy battle the day following w.

THE Romans were not a little surprised at the motions of the Carthaginian army, And defeats the and the new form of discipline introduced amongst them; notwithstanding which, Romans. f they affected to hold them both and their new general Xantippus in great contempt, not doubting but they should soon be able to give a good account of them. One capital error, according to Polybius, the Roman general committed in the arrangement of his forces. Though he took a proper precaution to fustain the shock of the enemy's elephants, he did not provide for the inequality of his cavalry, which was vastly inferior in number to the Carthaginian, but disposed them in such a manner, that they were broken almost upon the first onset. To which we may add from Appian, that the same general ought to have been deemed guilty of a great and complicated mistake, when, elated with his former success, through his great ardour, he overu Appian. Polyb. Oros. Eutrop. Zonar. Diod. Sic. Aur. Vict. Flor. ubi fup. w Appian Libyc. fub init. Polyb. Liv. Zonar. Flor. Eutrop. Oros. &c. ubi fup. Univ. hift. vol. iv. p. 665. w Appian. in fitigued his foldiers, led them through fuch places as exposed them to the enemy's a parties, posted on eminences to annoy them with missive weapons in their march; and, to crown all, passed a river parting the two armies, by which means he cut off a retreat, in case of any missortune. This bad conduct of Regulus proved the total ruin of his army; for Xintippus had thereby such an advantage over the enemy thrown into his hands, that he intirely defeated them, and either put to the fword. or took pritoners, all of them, except two thousand, who, after having broken his right wing, had drawn themselves out of the engagement, and made their escape to Clypea. Of the Cartbaginians eight hundred were flain in this action; but on the Roman side near thirteen thousand must have fallen in the battle and pursuit, if Polybius has given us a just account of the number of forces Manlius, at his departure for b Rome, left with Regulus. Xantippus took Regulus himself, and five hundred of his men, prisoners in the pursuit, and immediately carried them to Carthage. According to Eutropius, thirty thousand Romans lost their lives in this battle, and fifteen thousand their liberty; but this cannot be admitted, except we suppose, that Regulus had either received a strong reinforcement from Rome, since the departure of his collegue, or been joined by a good body of Africans in the interval betwixt that event and the battle; neither of which suppositions receives the least countenance from Polyvius, whom, in the main, we chuse to follow x.

The Carthaginians treat all the Roman proponers with great humanty, except Regulus.

THE Carthoginians treated all the Roman prisoners, except Regulus, with great humanity, hoping by this conduct to engage the Romans to behave with lenity and c moderation to the Carthaginian captives, who were very numerous, in their hands. But as for Regulus, he had infulted them in so outrageous a manner, in the height of his prosperity, that they could not forbear shewing him the greatest marks of their refentment on this occasion. According to Zonaras and others, he was thrown into a dungeon, where he had only fustenance allowed him barely sufficient to keep him alive; nay, his cruel masters, to heighten his other torments, ordered an huge elephant, at the fight of which animal, it feems, he was greatly terrified, to be constantly placed near him; which prevented him from enjoying any tranquillity or repole, and rendered his life a burden to him. When he would have prescribed dishonourable terms of peace to the Carthaginians, he pretended, with unparallelled haughti- d ness, that every thing he suffered them to possess ought to be esteemed a savour, with this further infult, that they ought either to overcome like brave men, or learn to fubmit to the victor. No wonder therefore that so harsh and disdainful a treatment should incense to the highest degree a nation naturally proud, as well as cruel and implacable, and even, in the point before us, force their interest itself to give way to their resentment. Zonaras intimates, that Regulus suffered himself to be surprised by Xantippus, not believing that he would have the courage to attack him. However this may be, as the Carthaginian army did not confift of above fixteen thousand men, besides the elephants, this ought to be looked upon as a most wonderful victory, especially considering the heroic valour of the Roman legions; and, as Fron- e tinus rightly infinuates, must be almost intirely attributed to the conduct and bravery of Xantippus v.

Great rejoicings at Carthage, on account of this victory. The Carthaginians remained on the field of battle till they had stripped the sain, and then entered their metropolis, which was almost the only place lest them, in great triumph. The citizens immediately repaired to the temples in crouds, to return thanks to the immortal gods for so signal a victory, and hung up in these temples (U), as so many trophies, the arms taken from the enemy. Several days were devoted wholly to selfvities and rejoicings, a spirit of joy and gladness disfusing itself over the whole city. However, according to some authors, they not only soon forgot the vast obligation they were under to Xantippus, but even shewed themselves guilty of most shocking ingratitude to him, as well as to the whole body of mercenaries, who had delivered them at the critical moment. If these writers may be credited, they

* Idem ibid. Vide Aurel. Vict. in At. reg. 40. Y. Zonar. ubi sup. c. 13. p. 391, 392. Cic. de offic. l. iii. S. Jul. Frontin. strat. l. ii. c. 2. ex. 11. & l. ii. c. 3. ex. ro. Diod. Sic. l. xxiii. ubi sup. Valer. Max. l. i. c. 1.

(U) Other nations, as well as the Carthaginians, hung up the arms taken from the enemy in the temples of their gods. The Gauls, and even the

a either actually destroyed Xantippus, or attempted his destruction; and not only refused paying the mercenaries the arrears due to them, but ordered the captains of the veffels, who were to carry them home, to leave them exposed on a desolate island, These horrid instances of Carthaginian ingratitude, we say, are attested by some authors; yet at the same time we think it our duty, as impartial historians, to observe, that their authority, in the point before us, is not to be intirely depended upon; for although we should allow, that the Carthaginians were frequently both cruel and ungrateful, nay, that they had a natural propenfity to the odious vices of cruelty and ingratitude; yet, in the present case, what advantage or emolument could accrue to them from fo execrable a fact? It could never have buried in oblib vion so illustrious an action as the victory Xantippus acquired for them, since that could not fail of being transmitted to posterity by their enemies, in order to deprive them, to whom they bore so implacable a hatred, of the merit of it; and indeed through this canal it has been conveyed down to us, and yet the authors, who stigmatize the Carthaginians, by accusing them of so enormous a crime, assign this as their motive to it; nor can any other motive be conceived, except we will suppose, that they did it purely to gratify a barbarous and inhuman disposition; which, wicked as the world is, can scarce be imagined possible. Besides, Polybius, the best author extant who has treated of this particular branch of history, fays not a word of it. Livy also, if we may judge of him from his epitomizer, passes it over in silence, c as do Florus, Eutropius, &c. who, being Roman historians, would most certainly have taken the greatest pleasure in relating such a story, if sounded on good authority, as reflecting an eternal shame and dishonour upon their most avowed and mortal enemies, whom they never failed to treat with the utmost freedom on all occasions. We think it therefore but equitable to suspend our belief of what Appian and Zonaras have affirmed with regard to the departure of Xantippus, especially as the scheme these authors have made the Carthaginians form for the destruction of the Lacedamonian mercenaries, is, in point of policy, so defective, and incredible, that no stress can be laid upon it; for, according to them, all these mercenaries, as well as their general, were to be exposed to inevitable destruction, without the loss of a single Card thaginian, or pretence of even a storm, to colour the perpetration of so horrid a crime. This certainly seems incompatible with that genius for refined policy and intrigues the Carthaginians were in history fo famous for; and therefore will, with great difficulty, be admitted for fact by our impartial and intelligent readers 2.

As for Regulus, he was a lively instance of the great instability of fortune and human affairs. Had he been either influenced by the maxims of found policy, or touched with the least sense of compassion for the misfortunes and sufferings of his fellow-creatures, he would have abated fomething of the rigour he shewed the Carthaginians after the last defeat given them, and might have concluded a most advantageous peace for the Romans; but, giddy with success, nothing less would satisfy e him than the total ruin of that people, or at least a reduction of them to a state of servitude, which they thought equivalent to it. This Providence did not permit him to accomplish; but, on the contrary, by a swift revolution, he fell from the height of prosperity to the lowest degree of contempt, nay, into the extremest misery and despair, his exalted station serving only to render his fall the more precipitate, and the less pitied by those he had before insulted. Many, and even recent, examples might be produced of princes, who, by pursuing the same conduct, have met with the same fate, would the limits of our history permit; but, as they will not, we must beg leave to refer our readers to their own observations on this head, and to those fine reflections of Diodorus Siculus and Polybius, which we could not avoid

f glancing at here 1.

We have, in a former part of this work, given a full account of what happened to Regulus in the subsequent part of his life, and censured Hoffman for differing from a great number of Roman authors in this particular. But our high regard to impartiality, a quality essentially necessary in an historian, obliges us now to lay before our readers the reasons, that may possibly have induced some learned men to believe the whole relation of Regulus's death, as handed down to us by the aforesaid authors, to be an absolute siction b.

<sup>2</sup> Appian. & Zonar. ubi sup. Horat. carm. l. iii. od. 5. Vide etiam Polyb. Liv. Flor. Eutrop. Oros. &c. ubi sup. & Univers. hist. vol. iv. p. 666.

Vales.

Vol. VI. Notice to the property of

1. All the Roman historians, as Romans, bore an implacable hatred to the very a memory of the Carthaginians, and did their utmost to make it appear odious in the eyes of all mankind. They were intirely void of impartiality when they tpoke of that nation, as manifestly appears from what Polybius relates of Fabius Pictor, one of their most celebrated writers, and the most antient of their historians. 2. All the subsequent Roman historians must have followed Fabius Pictor in this particular, since neither Diodorus Siculus nor Polybius have taken the least notice of Regulus's being sent to Rome, and fuffering death afterwards at Carthage upon his return; though, had this been true, they would undoubtedly have related it, the Greeks bearing as great an aversion to the Carthaginians, as did the Romans. 3. From a fragment of Diodorus Siculus in the excerpta (W) of Valefius, it appears, that Regulus's fons, at the inftigation of their mother, treated Hamilear and Bostar, two Carthaginian generals, taken prisoners, and delivered into her hands to exchange for her husband, with the utmost cruelty; infomuch that one of them died. She was prompted to this, according to the same fragment, by a persuasion, that her husband died at Carthage for want of a proper care being taken of him, upon the news she received of his death there. This evidently supposes Regulus to have died in that city, without any other torture than what the want of necessaries occasioned. 4. Palmerius has accounted for the whole story, as related by the Roman writers, and the Greeks attached to the Roman interest, in such a manner, as to give some reason to believe, that they are neither of them to be intirely relied upon in their accounts of the fufferings and death of Regulus. c Besides the authors cited in the fourth volume of this work, it will be necessary to confult those referred to in the margin, in order to have an adequate idea, according to the Roman tradition, of the point we are now upon .

Both the Carmicet with

THE Carthaginians, now forgetting all former misfortunes, began to talk in a thaginians and very high strain, threatening even Italy itself with an invasion. The Romans, being informed of this, placed strong garrifons in all the maritime towns, that lay most many dijasters. exposed, and fitted out a new fleet, with a strong body of land forces on board, not only to divert the enemy from executing the design they pretended to have formed, but also to retrieve their broken affairs in Africa. In the mean time the Carthaginians besieged Clypea and Utica in vain, being obliged to rise from before those places by d the approach of the Roman squadron, which had already plundered the island of Cor-(ura, and left a garrifon there. Having equipped a fleet of two hundred fail, they put to sea, in order to prevent the enemy from making a second descent; and coming up with them off cape Hermea, engaged them; but being routed, the Romans

> CDIOD. SIC. I. XXIV. in excerpt. Valef. Vide & PALMER. apud Gronov. in Appian. Libyc. p. 5, 6. Cic. orat. in Pison. de fin. l. v. sub fin. & alib. Aul. Gel. noct. Attic. l. vi. c. 4. Plut. in lib. de Herodot. malign. Horat. ubi sup. & carm. l. i. od. 12. Liv. epit. l. xviii. Suid. in Pήγκλ. Flor. l. ii. c. 2. Dio Cass. Sil. Ital. l. vi. Val. Max. l. ix. c. 2. Tertul. ad martyr. c. 4. Aur. Vict. de vir. illustrubi sup. Senec. de tranquil. anim. l. i. c. 15. ÆL. Tuber. apud. Gell. ubi sup. Eutrop. l. ii. Tuditanus apud Gell. ubi sup. August. de civ. Dei, l. i. c. 15, & c. 24. Appian. in Libyc. sub init. & Doubuse. Magnan. in 2000 vit. virus illustr. DOMINIC. MACHAN. in auctor. vit. viror. illustr. &c.

(W) The passage referred to imports in substance, that Regulus's widow, hearing of his death at Carthage, and supposing him to have died through want of necessaries, instigated her sons to use Hamilcar and Bostar, two Carthaginian generals, taken prisoners, and delivered into their hands by the senate, in order to exchange for their father, with the utmost inhumanity. They were confined in so streight a room, that they could not move, and kept without meat for five days together; insomuch that Bostar died of grief and hunger. Hamilear, in order to move her compassion, told her, that he had also all as so that her had also all as so that her had also all as so that he had also all as so that her had also all as so that he had also all as so that he had also all as so that he had also all as so that he had also all as so that he had also all as so that he had also all as so that he had also all as so that he had also all as so that he had also all as so that he had also all as so that he had also all as so that he had also all as so that he had also that he had also all as so that he had also that he had had taken all possible care of her husband, who was committed to his custody at Carthage. But this not availing, she extended her barbarity so far, as to cause him to be shut up five days with the dead body of Bostar, allowing him all that time only suftenance barely fufficient to keep him alive. Being ready to expire through the stench of the dead body, and the other miseries he laboured under, this barbarous treatment was rumoured abroad by the meaner servants; which reaching the ears of the tribunes of the people, they had like to have caused the young men to be put to death for so execrable a fact, which difgraced the Roman name. They were therefore obliged, by way of atonement for the perpetration of so heinous a crime, to burn the body of Bostar, and send his ashes to Carthage, as likewise to treat Hamilear with lenity during the remainder of his confinement. Tuditanus in Gellius. in order to take off the odium of this barbarous action, and fuit it more to the Roman tafte, tells us, that Regulus died for want of fleep, which the Car thaginians, by various methods, deprived him of; and that this reaching Rome, his fons used some noble Carthaginian captives, delivered to them by the senate, in the same manner. This relation, partial and disguised as it is, gives great weight to the valuable fragment of Diodorus referred to, and at the fame time renders Palmerius's notion of this affair not a little probable (21).

(22) Diod. Sic, in loc, citat. Tuditan, apud Gell, ubi sup. ut & Dominic, Machan, & Palmer, ubi sup. landat.

a landed without opposition at Clypea, defeated the Carthaginians in a pitched battle near that place; and carrying off the remains of Regulus's army, steered for Sicily. However, notwithstanding these victories, the Romans were greatly weakened. In the naval engagement they had been worsted, had not the two thousand men left at Clypea, attacked the enemy's rear unexpectedly, which obliged them to give way. In their passage to Sicily, they met with so dreadful a tempest, that out of three hundred and seventy odd vessels, of which their seet was composed, eighty only escaped, Diodorus Siculus says, they lost three hundred and forty galleys, besides about three hundred transports. Eutropius affirms only eighty galleys to have remained out of four hundred and fixty-four; infomuch that all the fea-coasts, from Camarina to b Pachynum, were strewed with the dead bodies of men and horses, as well as the wrecks of ships. Immediately after this disaster, Carthalo, a Carthaginian commander, advancing to Agrigentum, laid siege to it, and soon made himself matter of it. The town he laid in ashes, and demolished the walls, obliging the inhabitants to fly to Olympieum. The Carthaginians, apprifed of this, immediately fent Afdrubal to Sicily, with a large reinforcement of troops, and an hundred and fifty elephants. They likewise fitted out a squadron, with which they retook the island of Corsura; and though they had loft nine thousand men in the last action, besides five thousand in the naval engagement, they marched a strong body of forces, under the command of Hamilear, into Mauritania and Numidia, to punish the people of those countries c for shewing a disposition to join the Romans. Hamilear treated them with the utmost rigour and severity, causing all their chiefs to be crucified, putting great numbers of the poorer fort to the sword, and exacting from the rest a thousand talents of silver, besides twenty thousand head of cattle. In Sicily the consuls possessed themselves of Cephalædium by treachery; but Carthalo forced them to raise the siege of Drepanum, and retire with great loss. The Carthaginians however foon after found themselves obliged to abandon Ieta, as likewise the territories of the Selinuntines, Petrinians, Enatterinians, and Tyndarites. The Romans, landing afterwards an army in Sicily, laid siege (X) to Panormus, the capital of the Carthaginian dominions there; and making themselves masters of a fort or tower by the sea-side, carried that part of the d city called the New Town; but the inhabitants defending themselves with great bravery, they could not immediately reduce the other. However, forming the blockade of the place, they at last forced both it and the citadel to surrender for want of provisions. The Carthaginian fleet, posted to observe the enemy's motions, fell in with one of their squadrons, and carried off many of their ships laden with money and other valuable effects. Both parties soon after put an end to the operations of the campaign, the consuls returning to Rome, and the Carthaginians retiring into winter-quarters; so that we hear of no hostilities betwixt them till the sollowing fpring d.

THE Carthaginians, notwithstanding all their disasters, suffered less at sea than the The Carthagie Romans. The prodigious losses the last nation had sustained on that element, made nians become them entertain thoughts of declining all preparations for the future against the Cartha-flers at sea. ginians there. The next year, losing above an hundred and fifty galleys more on the d Diod. Sic. l. xxiii. in excerpt. Rhodoman. & Hoeschel. Polyb. ubi sup. Zonar. ubi supra, c. 14. OROS. l. iv. c. 9. EUTROP. l. ii.

(X) Panormus, according to Diodorus, derived its name from its port or haven, which was the finest in Sicily. The Phanicians probably called it Labrin, Or Leptin, from labt an harbour or station for ships. Polybius tells us, that it was the capital of the Carthaginian dominions in Sicily; and, if we may credit Thucydides, it was either of Punic or Phanician extraction, being built in very early times either by the Phoenicians, who traded with the Aborigines of Sicily, or their posterity, the most antient Cartha-ginians. That it was the most eminent city the Carthaginians possessed in Sicily, at least for a consi-derable period of time, and the most resorted to, if not for the most part inhabited, by that nation, is evident from the great number of coins belonging to it, with Punic legends upon them. Paruta and others exhibit many of these to our view, which ferve to confirm the authorities above-mentioned. Some Sicilian writers will have the Phanicians and Damascenes to have founded it in the time of Isaac. In support of which notion they produce two Hebrew inscriptions, found at that place in the reign of William the second king of Sicily, importing, that some colonies of those nations settled there at that time, and called the place Panormus. But as few, if any, Hebrew inscriptions of that date are genuine, and as Panormus is a Greek, not a Hebrem name, we must be excused from subscribing to their opinion (23).

(23) Thucyd. l. vi. Polyb. l. i. Diod. Sic. l. xxii. in excerpt. Rhodoman. Bochart. Clan. l. i. c. 24, 27. Vide etiam Iho, Fazel. de reb. Sic. & Ranzanum in lib. de Panorm. l. vi.

coasts

大野など

ندج دار وي g Xi

or the the

缸

coasts of Sicily, they came to a resolution to lay aside all naval operations, and consequently left the Carthaginians masters of the sea. This was not their only missortune; for, in the late battle with Regulus, the elephants had made such havock amongst them, that, for the two succeeding years, the Roman soldiers in Sicily durst not approach these furious animals within five or six stadia. This prevented the war from being carried on with any vigour during that term. The Romans however wrested Lipara, Himera, and Therma, out of the hands of the Carthaginians; but were obliged to raise the siege of Ersta. So slow a progress induced them to attempt making a figure once more by sea, hoping by this means to compensate for the terror, with which the elephants had struck their legions .

Asdrubal over- Asdrubal, the Carthaginian general in Sicily, perceiving how much asraid the Ro- b thrown by Carmans were of his elephants, marched out of Lilybaum, and advanced into the neighbourness. bourhood of Panormus, in order to draw the enemy to a battle. Cacilius, who commanded the Roman forces in the town, seemed to be afraid of him, till he had passed the river running close by the city, when, having a great advantage over him, he attacked him with incredible fury. The fight was very obstinate for some time, and the Romans were even repulsed by the violence of the elephants; but at last the dart-men wounded these boisterous animals in such a manner, that they fell foul upon their own troops, and threw them into confusion. This being observed by the Roman general, he sallied with a body of fresh forces out of the town, and attacking the enemy in flank, gave them a total defeat. The Carthaginians loft a vast number c of men in this action, it being one of the greatest overthrows they ever received in Sicily, besides many elephants, which were either killed or taken, and amongst the rest ten with their (Y) Indian leaders. The Carthaginian elephants could never after this battle make any impression upon the Roman troops; on which account the victory might juftly have been looked upon as of vaft consequence to them. According to Zonaras, the Carthaginian fleet, by being then in port, completed the ruin of the land-forces; for vast numbers of Astribal's soldiers, endeavouring to make their escape on board the galleys, sell into the sea, and were drowned. Diodorus intimates, that Asdrubal was, in a manner, compelled by his own troops to venture an engagement with the enemy; that advancing to Panormus, he passed the river above-men- d tioned with great temerity, not taking the least precaution to fecure himself against any attempts of the Romans; and that some merchants having brought a large quan-

E LIV. ZONAR. DIOD. SIC. POLYB. & OROS, ubi sup.

(Y) From the passage of Polybius here referred to, it is evident, that the Carthaginians, before the thirteenth year of the first Punic war, had an intercourse with India, as receiving elephants, and persons to manage and train them up, from thence. This greatly strengthens what Pliny intimates, viz. that the Carthaginians carried on a trade with the Indians, and imported from India many carbuncles of an inestimable value. This they must either have done by means of caravans going through the interior parts of Africa to the Arabic gulf, if not thro' Egypt to Persia and India, or by their own vessels trading to those parts, or lastly, by their communication with Tyre. The passage we are now considering from libering from the passage we have a second the second the second trade of the second trade o dering feems likewise clearly to prove, that the Carthaginians trafficked with the Persians, fince all caravans coming intirely by land from India to Carthage must necessarily pass thro' part of Persia; and we know, that the Persians dealt much in these animals. But that the Carthaginians were well known to the Persians in very early times, which we cannot well conceive to have been in any other manner than by trading with them, is evident from Cambyfes's intention to attack them, and from the embally Darius fent them towards the close of his reign, already mentioned. Besides, that they were acquainted with the Persian gulf, is probable from what Pliny relates of one of their sea-commanders, who secred his course that way, in order to make discoveries in very early times. If they traded with these remote nations by caravans, they might likewise have gone through part of the country of the Garamantes and Ethiopia; which that they did, appears probable from Pliny and Strato, who tell us, that the Indian, Garamantican, and Ethiopian carbuncles, by reason of their great plenty at Carthage, were called Carchedonian carbuncles; and that the Carthaginians received them from the Garamantes. After having weighed all these particulars, we cannot help thinking, that the Carthaginians fent caravans to the country of the Garamantes, Ethiopia, and Persia, as well as ships to the Red-sea, rather than that they had a communication with those parts of the world by means of the Tyrians. As a further proof of this, it may be considered, that Hanno, who is supposed to have written the periplus going under his name, one of their admirals, failed to the remotest coasts of Arabia from Cadiz, long before the age-we are now treating of; and that Pliny intimates their commerce to have been fo much more extenfive than that of any other nation, that merchandize was faid to be the invention of the Pæni, not of the Phanicians. Dalecampius, in his notes on Pliny, receives a great accession of strength from this passage of Polybius, and on his part illustrates this lastmentioned author, as well as Pliny. We shall referve what we have to fay of elephants. and those nations, who first used them in war, for a future note (24).

(24) Polyb. in loc. citae. Plin. l. xxxvii. c. 7. & Dalecamp. in loc. Strab. l. xvii. Herodot. l. iii. Juft. 1. xix. Plin. l. ii. c. 67.

a tity of wine into the camp, the Celtes got drunk, filling all parts with noise, disorder, and confusion; which Cacilius observing, sallied out of the town, put the Cartbaginian army to the rout, and either killed or took prisoners a vast number of men. Sixty elephants, according to the same author, that fell into the hands of the Romans, were fent to Rome as a great curiofity. It may not be improper to remark, that this exploit concluded the thirteenth year of the first Punic war f.

THE beginning of the following year, the Carthaginians received intelligence, that The Romans the Romans intended to form the fiege of Lilybaum, imagining, that the reduction of baum. that place would put an end to this tedious and bloody war. As they looked upon the preservation of Lilybaum, which was the only city they now possessed in Sicily, b except Drepanum, to be of the utmost consequence to them, they reinforced the garrison with a large body of chosen troops, and finished the fortifications in such a manner, as to render the place almost impregnable. Notwithstanding which, the two confuls, Manlius and Attilius, invested the place; and, after having opened trenches before it, carried on the siege with great vigour. The Carthaginians, some time before the beginning of this siege, had razed the city of Selinus, and transplanted the inhabitants to Lilybaum; so that this last place was very populous when the Roman army appeared before it. The garrison was also very numerous, consisting of ten thousand mercenary Gauls and Greeks, besides a large detachment of Carthaginian forces, commanded by Hamilear, an officer of great experience and bravery. Tho' e the Romans foon demolished several of the outworks, and even made their approaches close to the body of the place, yet Hamilcar desended it with an intrepidity and resolution worthy of himself. He rebuilt, as it were in a moment, many forts, which the enemy had destroyed with their battering-engines; sosted to every part of the town to give the necessary orders, prevent consuston, and animate the troops, as well as the citizens, by his presence; and lastly, made frequent, as well as vigorous fallies, upon the besiegers. According to Diodorus, in one of these sallies he killed ten thousand Romans upon the spot, put a great part of their army to slight, burnt many of their rams, balistæ, and catapults, and then entered triumphantly into the town. The Carthaginians in the mean time, finding their cavalry of no service in d the defence of the place, fent them to Drepanum. Soon after the last disaster, a famine began to rage in the Roman camp, which in a strort time introduced the plague there, of which, in a very few days, above ten thousand men were carried off. In fine, the besiegers, by such a train of calamities, coming, as it were, one upon the neck of another, lost more men than they could well have done in several pitched battles. This so greatly weakened, and at the same time despirited them, that had they not received an immediate supply both of troops and provisions from king

Hiero, they must have been infallibly obliged to raise the siege 8. But what the Romans could not effect by force, they attempted to accomplish The mercenaby treachery. In order to which, they so far corrupted some of the leaders of the ries enter into e mercenaries, that they decoyed them into their camp, to concert with them the pro- deliver the per measures for having the place delivered into their hands. This might have proved place into the fatal to the Carthaginians, had not one Alexon, an Achaian, discovered the whole hands of the conspiracy to Hamiltan; who, assembling all the remaining mercenary officers, Romans. acquainted them with the particulars of the horrid design, and, by his singular address, engaged them to persevere in their fidelity to the Carthaginians. Having fecured this point, he prevailed upon them next to endeavour at inspiring the soldiers under their command with the same sentiments. He likewise sent one Hannibal, the fon of the admiral of that name, who was crucified by his own men at Sulci in Sardinia, to keep the Gauls, with whom he was very popular, firm in the Carthagif nian interest; whilst Alexon went to hinder the Greeks, amongst whom he was extremely beloved, from entering into the enemy's measures. These salutary precautions had the defired effect; for the mercenary chiefs, returning foon after from the Roman camp, found their men so far from listening to their suggestions, that they drove them out of the place with the utmost fury (Z). Zonaras says, that the length f Polyb. Zonar. Eutrop. & Oros. ibid. Liv. epit. l. xix. Plin. l. viii. c. 6. S. Jul. Frontin. strat. l. ii. c. 5. ex. 4.

5 Diod. Sic. l. xxiv. in excerpt. Rhodoman. Polyb. l. i. Liv. epit. l. xix. Oros. ubi sup. c. 10. Zonar. ubi sup. c. 15. Univers. hist. vol. iv. p. 671, 672, &c.

(Z) Zonaras infinuates, that tho' Hamilear was apprifed of the confpiracy, he did not judge it ex-Vol. VI. N° 11.

pedient to take any notice of it, for fear of an open and public defection of the mercenaries; but that having and public defection of the mercenaries; but that of the fiege, and a want of pay, induced the mercenaries to entertain thoughts of a betraying the city to the Romans; of which Hamiltar being apprifed, he paid the officers their arrears, and appealed the minds of the foldiery by large promises; by which means all the sparks of discontent and sedition were extinguished. This impending storm being blown over, Hamilear rewarded Alexon for his fidelity, and continued his fallies upon the Romans with the usual success h.

The garrison forcement of ten thousand thage.

THE Carthaginians being informed, that the Romans had received a reinforcement receives a rein- from Hiero, though they could have no intelligence from the garrifon, concluded, that the Romans pushed on the siege with vigour, and that consequently Hamilear men from Car wanted some relief. They therefore sent one Hannibal with a supply of ten thousand men, who putting in at the island of Egusa, was obliged to stay there some time, in b expectation of a fair wind. He was not detained long here, but soon happily made his way into the town. Having landed his troops, he passed in the night by the enemy's camp to Drepanum, where he had a conference with his friend Adherbal, who commanded in that place. The subject of this conference undoubtedly was, how to open a communication betwixt Lilybæum and Drepanum. In consequence, as it is probable, of the measures there concerted, Hannibal, surnamed the Rhodian, was pitched upon to execute the plan formed by the two commanders above-mentioned. This he very luckily did for some time, and thereby greatly contributed to the support of the garrison of Lilybæum, as well as the service of the Carthaginian state in general; but was at last taken by some galleys detached from the Roman c fleet, in the manner by us already related i.

And burn in a fally the beliegers battering engines.

ALL communication betwixt Lilybaum and the other Carthaginian territories being thus cut off, the garrison was reduced to some extremities. However, at last a ftorm arose, which broke and rendered useless all the Roman battering-engines, and overturned many of the towers they had erected to facilitate the reduction of the This unexpected event prompted the Greek troops in garrison to attempt the destruction of the machines, which escaped the fury of the tempest; which they easily effected, and put a great number of Romans to the sword. The consuls, upon this unexpected blow, defitted from the attack of the town, turning the fiege into a blockade, and drawing a line round the place, to prevent any succours being thrown The besieged, on the other hand, repaired all the breaches made by the d enemy, strengthened the fortifications with some new works, and receiving a fresh flow of spirits from the great success they had met with, were determined to defend the town to the last drop of blood k,

Claudius totally routed by Aldrubal in a sea-sight.

2

Soon after this disaster, which greatly alarmed the Romans, Claudius the consulput to sea with a powerful sleet, having a design of surprising Drepanum. Upon his approach to that place, Adherbal, the commander there, was not a little amazed to see a formidable squadron entering the port, especially considering the blow the Romans had lately received. However, he foon refumed his usual presence of mind, and, affembling his troops, made a pathetic speech to them, expatiating upon the hardships of a siege, which they must inevitably undergo, if they suffered the enemy e to enter their harbour unattacked, and at the same time assuring them, that no doubt could be entertained of their vanquishing the Romans, considering the many advantages they had over them in point of situation, provided they sell upon them immediately, and did their duty. The soldiers and seamen, greatly animated by this speech, required to be led instantly against the enemy. Upon which Adherbal, drawing up his fquadron in line of battle near the rocks that lay on the coast, boldly advanced against Claudius, who was now entering the port. The engage-

h POLYB. & ZONAR. ubi sup. POLYN. DIOD, SIC, LIV. OROS. ubi fup. Univers. hist, ubi fupra. * POLYB. & DIODOR. ibid. Univers. hist. ubi fup.

having fecured the fidelity of the officers, by paying them their arrears, and calmed the minds of the foldiery, by promising them speedy payment, which the Carthaginians enabled him to do, by fending him immediately a large sum of money for that purpose, he, by this means, avoided the danger that threatened him. The same author moreover relates, that the Romans received the commanders of the mercenaries, who were expelled the city. by their own troops, with great kindness, gave them lands in Sicily, and other valuable effects, to compensate the loss they had sustained for their affection to them. This last particular is likely enough to be true; but as to the first, fince it contradicts Polybins, we think no degree of credit is due to it (29).

ment immediately began, and the fight was, for some time, obstinate and dubious; but at last the Carthaginians, by the lightness and activity of their vessels, by the disadvantageous situation of the Romans, who, through Claudius's imprudence, were posted near the shore, and lastly, by reason of the Roman galleys being incapable, on account of their clumsy make, of charging the enemy in slank or rear, as occasion should require, obtained a complete victory. Ninety-three of the Roman galleys, if we may give credit to Polybius, with the greatest part of their crews, sell into the hands of the Carthaginians, who, it is said, did not lose a single man or galley in this glorious action. According to Diodorus, Claudius lost an hundred and seventeen ships, and twenty thousand men. Eutropius affirms ninety galleys to have been taken, and ninety, with all the troops on board, sunk in this satal battle. And lastly, Orosius relates eight thousand men to have been killed or drowned; and twenty thousand taken prisoners. Claudius, with thirty vessels, made his escape (A) out of the fight to the camp at Lilybaum, bringing thither to the consuls the news (B) of his defeat; which was the greatest blow the Romans had received by sea since the commencement of this war.

Nothing was now celebrated at Carthage but the praises of Adherbal, who, at Carthaio, by this juncture, was effected, both on account of his confummate prudence, and per-his conduct, fonal valour, as one of the greatest heroes Carthage had ever produced: and indeed occasions a metfuch an intire overthrow given to a most proud and insulting enemy, could not but thagman arc be in the highest degree grateful to all orders of men in that metropolis, and conse-my, and is quently render the general, to whom it was chiefly owing, greatly acceptable to all therefore re his fellow-citizens. As the Romans had amassed a vast quantity of provisions on called to Car-] board their fleet, Adherbal furnished Lilybaum with a most plentiful supply, and thage. filled all his magazines at Drepanum. In the mean time Hamilear found himself inspired with new vigour, not only by the unexpected success of Adherbal, but by his having destroyed all the enemy's works, and military engines, in the fally abovementioned, wherein he was not a little favoured by the violent gust of wind, which rendered unquenchable the flames his Greek mercenaries had kindled amongst them. The Carthaginians likewise at this juncture, by ravaging the coasts of Italy and Sicily, d reduced the natives to the extremest poverty. Soon after Hanno, a Carthaginian officer, in a quinquereme, fell into the hands of Junius the consul, as he was steering with a new fleet for Lilybaum. However, this loss was foon repaired; for Adherbal, detaching Carthalo with an hundred galleys to observe the Roman squadrons and convoys fent to the relief of the camp before Lilybaum, gained several advantages over them, and at last had the pleasure of seeing them totally destroyed by a storm. Besides many other places, Carthalo reduced Ægythalus, a strong castle the Romans had possessed themselves of. Diodorus tells us, that in the first sea-sight with Carthalo, the Romans had thirty-five thousand men killed, and as many taken prisoners; but this is scarce credible. Notwithstanding all the losses the e Romans had fultained, they continued the blockade of Lilybæum with great firmness, cantoning all their troops in the neighbourhood, being determined, if possible, to carry the place. Carthalo, by some indiscreet actions, became so unpopular amongst the troops, that he had like to have occasioned an universal desection; which obliged the senate to recal him to Carthage. The Romans, being greatly dejected by their late frequent misfortunes at fea, refolved once more to lay aside all thoughts of opposing their rival upon the watery element. This revived the drooping spirits of the Carthaginians, and encouraged them to entertain hopes of coping with their formidable enemy once more by land. In order to which, they appointed Hamilcar, surnamed Barcas, the head of the Barcan faction in Carthage, general of their forces.

I Idem ibid. Oros. & Zonar. ubi fup. Eutrop. l. ii. Flor. l. ii. c. 2. fub fin. S. Jul. Frontin. strat. l. ii. c. 13. ex. 9. Val. Max. l. i. c. 4. ex. 3. & l. viii. c. 1. ex. 4.

f This extraordinary person, by his future conduct both in Sicily, Africa, and Spain, (26) S. Jul. Frontin. in loc. citat.

(17) Died. Sic. l. xxiv. sub init, in excerpt. Valesii.

(A) Frontinus tells us, that Claudius made his escape with twenty ships, which he adorned in a triumphal manner, and by that means passed by some of the enemy's guard-ships without hurt, the Carthaginians on board believing him to have been victorious (26).

(B) We think it not improper to acquaint our readers here, that they will find this rash man's character drawn at full length by Diodorus Siculus, in one of his fragments published by Valesus (27).

demonstrated himself to be the greatest general, excepting his son Hannibal, who a indeed outshined him, that ever appeared at the head of the Carthaginian armies m.

Hamilton and makes

Hamilear (C), receiving a charte blanche from the senate, to act as he should think lands in Sicily proper for the service of the republic of Carthage, set sail from Carthage in the feveral motions eighteenth year of this war. According to Cornelius Nepos, he was a persect youth, when he took upon him the command of the army; which, confidering the bad fituation of the Carthaginian affairs, adds no small lustre to his first gallant atchievements. Having put to death all the ringleaders and most guilty of the mutineers. he ravaged the coasts of the Locrians and Brutians, and then made a descent near Panormus with all his forces. Upon his landing, he marked out a camp betwixt Panormus and Eryx; which was of itself a sufficient proof of his great military capa- b city, fince the spot of ground pitched upon, seems, from the description given us of it by Polybius, to have been the most commodious for the end proposed, that could possibly be conceived. Soon after his encampment here, he detached some galleys, with a body of land-forces on board, to pillage the Roman allies. These executed their orders with great severity, making excursions as far as Cuma, and laying the country waste where-ever they moved. Upon their return, he marched with his army to the very walls of Panormus, though the enemy lay encamped but eight hundred paces from that city, and afterwards returned to his former camp. For fome time the generals on both sides made it their whole business to observe each others motions. In short, by marches and counter-marches, by rencounters and ambuscades, c by military falfifications, and stratagems of all kinds, Hamilear and the confuls strove who should shew the greatest skill and dexterity; which, though it greatly fatigued the foldiers, trained them up in military discipline, and formed them for action in the most perfect manner. But such a variety of motions, as was the result of this conduct, being too tedious for an historian to describe, Polybius has, in a great meafure, omitted it n.

Neither Cile other to a bat-

BOTH the Carthaginian and Roman camps were, by art and nature, rendered could force the impregnable; fo that neither fide could force the other to a battle. The military operations therefore, for a confiderable period of time, confifted in rencounters betwixt parties, who, on both fides, behaved with very great bravery. The fuc-d cess of these skirmishes was dubious, sometimes one party being victorious, and fometimes the other. The Carthaginians however in general, from what we find in Polybius, seem rather to have had the advantage, especially as Diodorus intimates, that Hamilear took a castle of considerable strength in the territory of Catana, before he advanced to Eryx. It so, this ought undoubtedly to be ascribed to the incomparable conduct of Hamilear; fince, from the time he became their general, they performed feats, of which before they might justly have been thought incapable.

The Romans teer-squadron.

THE Romans had, for some time past, desisted from all naval preparations, being equip a priva- deterred from them by the terrible disasters they had met with at sea; and confined themselves wholly to a land-war, thinking their land-forces much more than a match e for those of Carthage. But finding themselves greatly mistaken in their views, by the excellent conduct of Hamilcar, and that, instead of carrying their point in Sicily, they were even themselves reduced to some extremities there by the enemy, they began to think of annoying them again by sea. In order to this, a seet was first equipped by private persons. This privateer-squadron of galleys was of consi-

> m POLYB. DIOD. Sic. Liv. Flor. Eutrop. Oros. Zonar. ubi fup. Val. Max. l. i. c. 4. ex. 3. Vide & niverf hift. ubi fup. & p. 673, 674, 675, &c. n Diod. Sic. l. xxiv. in excerpt. Heefch. Polyb. Univers hift, ubi sup. & p. 673, 674, 675, &c. 1. i. ubi fup. CORN. NEP. in vit. Hamile. fub init. · Idem ibid.

(C) The furname of this famous general the Greek authors write Barcas; but the Latin, Barca. It was common for the Greeks to terminate the same proper name in as, that the Latins did in a, and even fuch proper names as were of African extraction; witness Micipsas, Micipsa, &c. According to Silius and others, this was the furname of a family, which was the noblest in Carthage, being lineally descended from the antient kings of Tyre. The party in Carthage, that adhered to this Hamilear, was, from him, called the Barchine or Barcan faction, of which Livy takes particular notice. Servius in direct terms afferts this name to appertain to a family; and Plutarch mentions one Maherbal, or Adherbal, (who intimated to Hannibal, that he did not know fo well how to make a proper use of a victory, as to get one) as a member of it. We may possibly have occasion to speak further of this family in the next fection (28).

(28) Sil. Ital. l. vi. Serv. in Æn. iv. ver. 632. Liv. l. xxi. c. 2, 3. Plut. in Fab. p. 184. Corn. Nep. in vit. Hamile. Appian. Iberic. p. m. 428. Vide Reinec, hist. Jul. vol. ii. & Bentleium in dissert, ad Malelam, p. 88, 89, ere. edit. Oxon, 1691.

derable

a derable force, and fitted out chiefly with a view of plundering the enemy's territories, and inuring the Romans to the sea, to which they were now, in a manner, strangers. They committed great depredations on the coasts of Africa; and entering the port of Hippo, notwithstanding the citizens had endeavoured to hinder their entrance, by shutting up the mouth of the harbour with a large and strong chain thrown across it, they laid the greatest part of the town, together with the shipping, in ashes. Having filled their vessels with spoils, they returned to Panormus, near which place they gave a considerable deteat to the enemy. In the mean time one of the consuls pushed on the fiege of Lilybaum, and the other that of Drepanum. The Romans likewise dislodged the Carthaginians from the island of Columbaria; which Hamilcar in vain b attempted to retake. Fabius, who carried on the siege of Drepanum, afterwards, with incredible labour, joined this island to the continent; which greatly facilitated his approaches. Notwithstanding these advantages, the brave Hamiltar terribly harasted the enemy, not only making incursions into the very heart of the island, but plundering frequently the coasts of Italy, that lay opposite to Sicily. Nothing considerable, for some time, happened after this, except that a cartel was settled betwixt both parties for an exchange of prisoners. They were exchanged man for man; but the Carthaginian prisoners being by far most numerous, many of them were redeemed by money out of the hands of the Romans P.

ABOUT three years after Hamilcar's arrival in Sicily, he made himself master of Hamilcartakes c Eryx by furprize. The town was fituate on the declivity of a mountain of the Eryx. same name, and had fallen again to the Romans since the reduction of it by Carthalo above mentioned. What rendered this action the more remarkable, was, that the Romans had not only a body of troops in the town, whom they might easily have supported, and the support of whom was of the highest consequence to them, but were likewise in possession both of the top and foot of the mountain, where they had forts defended by strong garrisons. By the possession of this post, the Romans on the fummit of the mountain laboured under all the hardships and inconveniencies of a place closely besieged; notwithstanding which, they bore all their calamities with wonderful patience, as well as behaved with incredible bravery and resolution. Had milear maintained himself in the advantageous post he had gained with equal bravery. However, as the Romans were masters of the open country, he found himself sometimes streightened for want of provisions, and with no small difficulty preserved the avenue, keeping open a communication with the fea, by means of which he, from time to time, received supplies. Fabius represents both parties as finking under the miseries they then endured; but Polybius, with greater justice, and more agreeable to the faith of history, as triumphing over them. Both sides continued in this melancholy situation for the space of two years. The Romans, notwithstanding the difficulties they were reduced to, still continued the blockade of Lilybaum 9.

As the privateer-squadron was only a prelude to the figure the Romans intended to The Romansmake by sea, in the consulate of C. Lutatius Catulus and A. Postbumius, they fitted fit out a new e out another fleet of two hundred fail, which was likewise, in a great measure, equip-fleet. ped at the expence of private persons. The command of this armament was given to C. Lutatius, with an intention to strike a home-stroke, and force fortune to give a coup de grace to the Carthaginians. In the first place the consul possessed himself of the port of Drepanum, and all the other harbours in the neighbourhood of Lilybæum. Afterwards he took care to exercise his soldiers and seamen with the utmost diligence, that they might be able to look the enemy in the face, as firmly believing, that a decifive action by fea must put an end to this long and burdensome war. Soon after their entrance into the haven of Drepanum, the Romans attempted to storm the town, and might have succeeded in their attempt, had not the conful been wounded; f which occasioned some consustion, and gave the enemy an opportunity of repulsing Zonaras observes, that when the troops on both sides were drawn up in order of battle before the fight off the islands called Ægates, the place of rendezvous for the Carthaginian fleet, a blazing star or comet appeared, to the great terror of both parties; but seemed to point directly at the Carthaginians. Though the wind proved unfavourable to Lutatius when he came in fight of the enemy's fleet, yet he resolved to attack them, fince they expected every moment to be joined by Hamilear, whose name was become terrible to the Romans. The Carthaginians, intending now to 9 Polys. Diop. Sic. Conn. Nep. ubi fup.

make

make t eir last effort by sea, had collected their whole naval power, confishing of a four hundred fail. The Romans on this occasion, according to Polybius, fitted out two hundred galleys, as above observed; but Eutropius and Orosius make them to have been three hundred. Both fleets, coming in fight of each other, made the necessary dispositions for an engagement, which was to determine the fate of Sicily t.

Which intirely defeats that of the Carthagi-

THOUGH the galleys, of which the Carthaginian armament was composed, in number greatly exceeded those of the Romans, yet, in many respects, the Roman mans near the squadron was vally superior to the Carthaginian; for whereas the forces on board the Elands Augates, latter confisted, for the most part, of new levies, intirely raw and undisciplined, Lutatius had taken care to man the former with choice troops, and able feamen, trained up in the most perfect manner. Besides, as his vessels were built after the b model of the galley taken from Hannibal the Rhodian, in lightness and activity they far excelled those of the enemy. To which we may add, that the Carthaginians had the naval power of the Romans in the highest contempt, as having themselves, for fome years, been mafters at sea; and therefore, upon the first advice of the enemy's motions, they being vastly surprised, put to sea a fleet fitted out in haste, manned only with mercenaries, who had neither courage, experience, nor zeal for the state, in whose service they were engaged. Hanno therefore made but a faint resistance, his forces being routed at the first onset. Florus says, that the Carthaginian fleet was so heavy laden with troops, baggage, arms, provisions, &c. that the whole city of Carthage seemed to have been on board, and that the vessels could not move with c any freedom; which greatly contributed to Hanno's defeat. The loss of the Carthaginians on this melancholy occasion seems greatly to be exaggerated by Eutropius, who tells us, that they had seventy-three ships taken, an hundred twenty five sunk, thirty-two thousand men made prisoners, thirteen thousand killed or drowned, and that an immense quantity of gold and silver fell into the victors hands. Orosius differs not much from him. But Polybius, who undoubtedly comes nearer the truth, affirms, that the Romans (D) funk only fifty of the Carthaginian vessels, and took seventy with their crews, the rest making off in great confusion to the isle of Hiera. Lutatius, following his blow, advanced to the city of Eryx; where engaging the Carthaginians, he cut off two thousand men. This last action concluded the operations of the first d Punic war'.

Which is followed by a peace.

THE Romans, naturally insolent in prosperity, were so elated with their victory, that Lutatius infifted upon Hamilear's delivering up his arms to him; but this haughty demand was rejected with the foorn and indignation it deferved, that great captain protesting, That he would suffer all extremities, rather than give up those arms to his country's enemies, with which he had been entrusted for its preservation. The consul however understanding, that Hamilear was invested with full powers to fign a treaty with him, and being defirous of having the honour of putting an end to a war, which had cost both republics such an immense quantity of blood and treasure, before the expiration of his office, he concluded a peace with that general, provided the senate e and people of Rome would ratify it, upon the following terms: That the Carthaginians should immediately evacuate Sicily; that they should never for the future make war upon Hiero, or any other ally of the Romans; that they should restore all the Roman prisoners in their custody without ransom, but redeem their own with money; and lastly, that, within twenty years, they should pay the Romans two thousand two bundred Euboic talents of the purest silver . Zonaras intimates, that the senate of Carthage sent a deputation directly to Lutatius to sue for peace; but he must give way to the superior authority of Polybius and Cornelius Nepos, who affirm, that Hamiltan Barcas had the management of the whole transaction. The people of Rome, greatly pussed up with Philinus, a writer of fuch partiality, that his authority is not to be regarded. The tame author affirms. that the Romans loft eighty thips, and had fix thoufand men taken prisoners in this action; which, considering the relation of it given us by other hiflorians, feems absolutely impossible (28).

T POLYB. LIV. FLOR. DIOD. Sic. ubi fup. Zonar. ubi fup. c. 17. Eutrop. l. ii. Oros. l. iv. c. 10. Idem ibid. ut & Lucius Ampel. in lib. memorial. c. 46. * Idem ibid. ut & Lucius Ampel. in lib. memorial. c. 46. ALFENUS VARUS in lib. digeft, 34. & conjectan. 2. apud Aul. Gell. in noct. Attic. l. vi. c. 5. & Oros. ubi

(D) According to Diodorus, the Roman fleet, ships of war and transports, amounted to a thousand fail, and the Carthaginian only to two hundred and fifty. But this contradicts all other authors, and is highly improbable. The less credit is to be given to Diodorius in this particular, as he depends intirely upon

S

3,

C

ć

::

K

ż

a their unexpected success, and looking upon the republic of Carthage as now lying at their mercy, refused to ratify the treaty, till they had fent ten deputies to Sicily, to inform themselves thoroughly of the situation of affairs there, who, in conjunction with the conful, agreed to the ratification of it, upon condition the four following additional articles were inserted in it: That the Carthaginians should increase the abovestipulated sum with two hundred talents; that a thousand talents should be paid immediately, and the remaining sum in ten years time; that the Carthaginians should not approach with their long ships either the coasts of Italy, or any territories belonging to the allies of the Romans; that they should not make levies either in the dominions of the Romans, or those of their allies, and lastly, that they should abandon all the little islands between Sicily b and the coast of Italy. As these hard conditions were extorted from Hamiltan by the Romans, because they saw him not in a situation to resuse them, he, from this moment, conceived an implacable hatred to that nation. In fine, he was determined to conclude a peace with them upon any terms, to give his country time to breath, that he might have an opportunity of hereafter chastifing them for the unparallelled infolence they had been guilty of through the whole course, and more particularly at the conclusion, of this war. Authors are not intirely agreed about the precise duration of the first Punic war. Polybius, Diodorus, Livy, and Zonaras, say, it continued twenty-four years; whereas Orofius, Eutropius, Syncellus, and others, affirm it to have lasted twenty-three years only, with whom Gellius, as he makes it to have c commenced A. U. C. 490. feems to agree. Be this as it will, both fides suffered extremely by it, the Komans having lost, since their first putting to sea, seven hundred ships, and the Carthaginians sive hundred. We shall not here transcribe the reflections Polybius makes upon the power of both states in this war, since our readers may so easily have recourse to that excellent historian; but content ourselves with observing, that though, in his opinion, the Roman soldiers were far superior to the Carthaginian in valour and resolution, yet he allows Hamiltar, for his conduct and bravery, to have been the greatest captain of the age ".

THE Carthaginians were no sooner got out of this bloody and expensive war, The Libyan than they found themselves engaged in another, which had like to have proved satal war. d to them. The mercenary troops, that had ferved under Hamilear in Siedly, and distinguished themselves greatly on all occasions, upon their return to Africa, found the state of Carthage so drained, that, far from being able to give them the largesses and rewards promised by Hamilear, it could not pay them their arrears. This, with some other concurring causes, occasioned a war (E), which, for three years and an half, preyed upon the very vitals of the republic, and was attended with fuch instances of cruelty and barbarity, as are scarce to be parallelled in history. The antient historians call it the Libyan or African war, and sometimes the war with the mercenaries. As many falutary instructions may be drawn from thence, of great fervice to some states in all ages, for the better regulation of their conduct in several e important particulars, which is one of the great ends of history, Polybius has transmitted to posterity a full and minute account of it. For the same reason we think it incumbent upon us, in this part of our work, to insert the substance of what has been laid down by that noble author relating to fo remarkable a transaction, affuring our readers at the fame time, that nothing of moment shall be omitted, that we can be supplied with from other antient historians w.

As foon as Hamilear had put the last hand to the treaty above-mentioned, he The mercenary retired, with the forces which were in Eryx, to Lilybaum, and there refigned his troops of the commission, leaving to Gifco, the commandant of that place, the care of transport-greatly difing them to Africa. Gisco, being an officer of great penetration, as though he had gusted, on acf foreseen what would happen, did not ship them off all at once, but in small and count of not refeparate parties, that those who came first might be paid off, and sent home, before full pay.

greatly corrupted, and confequently fland in need of many emendations, we fluid not fcruple giving the preference to Polybins, who affirms, that this War latted three years and an half (30).

POLYB. DIOD. SIC. LIV. CORN. NEP. ZONAR. OROS. EUTROP. ubi fup. SYNCEL. in chronograph. p. 275. IL. GELL. in noch. Attic. l. xvii. c. 21. fub fin. w Vide Polyb. l. i. p. 65-89. Diob. Sic. l. xxv. Aul. Gell. in noct. Attic. l. xvii. c. 21. sub fin. in excerpt. Rhodoman.

(E) Diodorus Siculus in this point differs from Polybius; for he tells us, that this bloody war continued four years and four months. But as this is afferted in one of his fragments, all of which are the arrival of the rest. The Carthaginians at home however did not act with the a same forecast and precaution. As they were almost intirely exhausted by the last war, and the immense sum of money, in consequence of the peace, paid to the Romans, they judged it would be a laudable action to fave fomething to the public, not considering the injustice, as well as imprudence, of the measure they were going to pursue in order to this. They therefore did not pay the mercenaries in proportion as they arrived, thinking it more proper to wait till they all came together, with a view of obtaining from the whole body a remission of some part of their arrears; but being foon made sensible of their wrong conduct on this occasion, by the frequent disorders these barbarians committed in the city, they, with some difficulty, prevailed upon the officers to take up their quarters at Sicca, and canton their troops in that neigh-b bourhood, giving them a fum of money for their present subfishence, and promising to adjust their pretensions, when the rest of their comrades came from Sicily. For some time they refused to begin their march, because the Carthaginians were not disposed to permit their wives and children to stay in Carthage, as they desired, believing, that this would be an inducement to the foldiers to return often to Carthage, and consequently deprive them of the benefits they had proposed to themselves from their departure. However, this difficulty was at last got over; and all the mercenaries already arrived in Africa, with their wives, children, and baggage, marched to Sicca. Polybius looks upon this step as an oversight in the Carthaginians, since, had the women and children remained in Carthage, they would have been as so many hostages c for the future good behaviour of the foldiers: and indeed that fuch an advantage would have more than counterbalanced the inconvenience arising from an opposite conduct, hinted at by the same author, notwithstanding the sierceness of the African troops, required no uncommon degree of fagacity to apprehend 1.

Hanno increases their disgust. Being now wholly immersed in idleness, to which they had long been strangers, a neglect of discipline ensued, and of course a petulant and licentious spirit immediately took place. They were now determined not to acquiesce in receiving their bare pay, but to insist upon the rewards Hamilear had promised them, and even to compel the state of Carthage to comply with their demands by force of arms. The senate, being apprised of the mutinous disposition of the soldiery, dispatched Hanno, one of d the sufferes, to pacify them. Upon his arrival at Sicca, he behaved in a very preposterous and imprudent manner. He expatiated largely upon the poverty of the state, and the heavy taxes with which the citizens of Carthage were loaded; and therefore, instead of answering their high expectations, he desired them to be satisfied with receiving part of their pay, and remit the remainder to serve the pressing exigencies of the republic y.

Upon which they advance in a body to Tunes.

Nothing could have been more impolitic than this conduct of Hanno, excepting that of the Carthaginians, in employing a person so unqualified for the business he went upon. In the first place, he exposed his country's weakness to the contempt of the mercenaries, and then farther inflamed them against it, by refusing to comply e with their just pretensions, when they seemed determined to insist upon a compliance with the most extravagant. But this person's conduct was all of a piece, both in his civil and military capacity, as will appear in the course of this war; so that Carthage must have been ruined, had she not had so able a captain as Hamilear to support her in the time of this her great distress. In sine, the mercenaries being highly exasperated, that neither Hamilear, nor any other of the principal officers, who commanded them in Sicily, and who were the best judges of their merit, appeared on this occasion, but only this Hanno, a person utterly unknown, and above all others disagreeable, to them, had immediately recourse to arms. Assembling therefore in a body, to the number of twenty thousand men, they advanced to Tunes, and immediately encamped before that city z.

As Polybius's history is interspersed throughout with the finest political maxims and restections, so scarce any part of it abounds more with them than that describing the beginning of the Libyan war. It is supersuous to give these at large, because the author is in every one's hands; and therefore we shall only observe, that though, in some respects, he approves of the Carthaginian practice of making up their armies chiefly of mercenaries, yet, in the main, he condemns that practice, and demonstrated

* Polys. ubi fup. 7 Idem ibid. & Appian in Libyc, p. 7. edit. Tollii, Amft. 1670. 2 Polys. ubi fup. 3

ď,

d

ď

ne of Ų.

12

FW)

13

-13

روند. معلق

H.

ribiti de tra

ji, I

ET.

a strates, from the breaking out of this war, as well as from the nature of the thing, that an observance of the fundamental axiom on which they proceeded, might sometimes produce dismal effects. They imagined, that by drawing their forces from different nations, who did not understand one another, they should prevent all conspiracies, intrigues and combinations against the state; and undoubtedly this had a tendency to the end proposed. But what Aristotle has observed of their constitution in general, viz. that it was more wisely framed to prevent inconveniencies than remedy them, may be applied to this particular custom; for though the evil guarded against by it was frequently by this means prevented, yet when it happened, the consequence could scarce sail of being deplorable, since it was next to impossible for any officers to persuade a soldiery, composed of so many nations, in any tongue, to listen to the distates of reason. As Polybius has set this point in a strong light, we shall refer our readers to him, and now return to the history.

THE Carthaginians, being greatly alarmed at the approach of so formidable a body The mercenato Tunes, made large concessions to the mercenaries, in order to bring them back to ries break out their duty. They ordered them supplies of provisions at their own prices, and sent rebellion. a deputation of even senators themselves to confer with their chiefs, and, if possible, to satisfy them. Far from being softened, they grew more insolent upon these con-to satisfy them. Far from being softened, they grew more insolent upon these concessions, taking them for the effects of sear and weakness in the Carthaginians. As this powerful corps consisted of Iberians, Gauls, Ligurians, natives of the Balearic islands, Greeks, and Africans, who were strangers to one another's language, the Carthaginians sound it next to impossible to treat with them. Many of them likewise being slaves and deserters, and consequently expecting capital punishment, either for this rebellion, or some other enormous crime, did their utmost to prevent all friendly intercourse with the state of Carthage. They moreover considered that republic as destitute of troops, and themselves as the best soldiers in the world, having performed many notable exploits in Sicily, and been trained up there in the art of war by the most celebrated captain of the age. These considerations, for some time, made them intirely averse to all thoughts of an accommodation. They rose in their

- demands, without the least regard to reason, justice or moderation. They practised devery knavish art that could be thought of to extort money from their masters. When one point was gained, they immediately had recourse to a new artistice, on which to ground some fresh pretension. Was their pay settled beyond the agreement made with them? they still would be reimbursed for the losses, which they pretended to have sustained, either (E) by the death of horses, the excessive price they had, at certain times, paid for their bread-corn, or their short allowance of provisions at those seasons. They insisted also upon the recompence due to their merit, so often promised; and that, in all these points, they should have immediate satisfaction given them. The Carthaginians, finding themselves obliged to make a virtue of necessity, shewed a disposition to satisfy them in all points, how unreasonable soever, and agreed to refer themselves to the opinion of some general in Sicily, who had com
  - and agreed to refer themselves to the opinion of some general in Sicily, who had commanded them there, as they all along desired, leaving the choice of such commander intirely to them. Accordingly they pitched upon Gisco, a person greatly beloved by them, to mediate this assair, believing Hamilcar to have been a principal cause of the ill treatment they had met with, since he never appeared amongst them, and, according to the general opinion, had voluntarily resigned his commission. Gisco soon arrived at Tunes with money to pay the troops; and after conferring with the officers, and the several nations apart, he harangued them in a mild and infinuating manner, put them in mind of the long time they had been in the Carthaginian service, the considerable sums they had received from the republic; and, in short, gave them to understand, that their reasonable demands would be complied with:
- f gave them to understand, that their reasonable demands would be complied with; at the same time desiring them to recede from all exorbitant claims, and rest satisfied with their pay. This made such an impression upon the minds of the soldiery, that a treaty was upon the point of being concluded, when Spendius and Mathos, two of * Idem ibid. Artsr. de rep. l. ii. c. 11.

(E) According to Diodorus Siculus, the mercenaries infifted upon being paid for every one of their body who fell in Sicily, as well as for the loss of mand (30).

(30) Diod. Sic. in loc. jam laudat.

Vol. VI. Nº 11.

the principal mutineers, occasioned a tumult in every part of the camp. Spendius a was by nation a Campanian, who had been a flave at Rome, and fled to the Carthaginians. He was a strong, lusty, and excremely bold fellow. The apprehensions he was under of being delivered into the hands of his old mafter, by whom he was fure to be hanged or crucified, his crime meriting capital punishment by the Roman laws, if a pacification took place, prompted him to break off the accommodation. Mathos was an African, and free-born; but as he had been active in raifing the rebellion, and was well acquainted with the implacable disposition of the Cartbaginians, he knew, that a peace must infallibly prove his ruin. He therefore very warmly espoused the interests of Spendius, and infinuated to the Africans the danger of concluding a treaty at that juncture, as this could not but leave them fingly exposed to the rage of the b Carthaginians. The Gauls, Iberians, Ligurians, and Greeks, said he, after having received their arrears, will be dismissed, and from thenceforth enjoy an uninterrupted repose amongst their countrymen at home; whereas you, being lest alone, will have the whole guilt of the rebellion imputed to you, and, destitute of support, fall an easy sacrifice to the resentment of your imperious masters. This gave a new turn to affairs, and so incensed the Africans, who were much more numerous than the troops of any other nation, that they immediately affembled in a tumultuous manner. The foreigners foon joined them, being inspired by Spendius with an equal degree of fury. Nothing now was heard amongst them, but the most bitter oaths and horrid imprecations uttered against Gifco and the Carthaginians. Whoever offered to make any remonstrance, or lend c an ear to temperate counsels, was stoned to death by the enraged multitude; nay, many persons lost their lives, barely for presuming to speak, before the purport of their discourse could be known, or any one could from thence with certainty infer, whether they were in the interest of the Carthaginians or Spendius. As the state of Cartbage had very impoliticly supplied the malecontents with plenty of wine, and all kinds of provisions, they indulged themselves with great freedom; and being at this very juncture heated (F) with wine, which they had drunk to great excess, they gave a full vent to their rage and infolence, threatening the African republic with utter destruction. In fine, no one having the courage to open his mouth in favour of peace, the troops made choice of Spendius and Mathes to head them in the intended d expedition b.

And advance towards Utica.

In the midst of these commotions, Gisco behaved with great firmness and intrepi-That general had too much courage, and too great a regard for his country's welfare, to defift from all possible attempts to reduce the mutineers to reason, notwithstanding his present dangerous situation. He lest no methods untried to soften the officers, and calm the minds of the foldiery, though at the same time he kept up an air of dignity and command, giving them to understand, that Carthage was not in such low circumstances as they imagined. But the many false steps the Carthaginians had been guilty of fince the commencement of these troubles, as well as before, defeated his good intentions, and rendered ineffectual all his endeavours. The e torrent of fedition was now become so strong and rapid, that there was no possibility of stemming it, or keeping it within any bounds. A scarcity of provisions succeeding their late plenty and profusion, the troops, in an insolent manner, demanded of Gifco an immediate fupply, who, to reprove their infolence, bade them go to Mathos their captain for it. Such an accident as this, considering the present disposition of the malecontents, could not but set the whole camp in a flame. Shall he with impunity, said they, not only resuse redressing our just grievances and complaints, but turn even our wants and necessities into ridicule? In a moment therefore they seized upon the b Polyb. & Appian. ubi fup. Diod. Sic. l. xxv. in excerpt. Vales.

(F) We learn from Polyanus, that the Libyans or Africans were much addicted to drunkenness; which Himileo, a Carthaginian general, being apprised of, found an opportunity of intoxicating their troops in a war the Carthaginians had with that people, and, by this stratagem, gained a fignal advantage over them. Possibly the Carthaginians might have something of that kind in view at this time, when they supplied the mercenaries with such quantities of wine. If they had not, they were in the highest degree impolitic to furnish their enemies with wine at this juncture, as well as all forts of provisions. Be this as it will, they seem to have been infatuated, their conduct, from the conclusion of the first Punic war, having been nothing but a series of blunders and mistakes. We shall not however here expatiate upon this topic, but refer our curious readers to Polybius, whose judicious reflections and observations cannot fail of giving them ample satisfaction (31).

e e

ų,

ú

27

; af

7

1 k

N.

a military cheft, dividing the money amongst themselves in part of their arrears, put the person of Gisco under arrest, and treated him, as well as all his attendants, with the utmost indignities. Mathas and Spendius, to destroy the remotest hopes of a reconciliation with Carthage, applauded the courage and resolution of their men, loaded the unhappy Gifco, and his followers, with irons, and formally declared war against the Carthaginians. All the cities of Africa, to whom they had fent deputies, to exhort them to recover their liberty, foon came over to them, except Utica and Hippo Diarrbytus, or, as Polybius calls it, Hippacra. By this means their army being greatly increased, they divided it into two bodies; with one of which they moved towards Utica, whilst the other marched to Hippo, in order to beliege both b those places. The Carthaginians in the mean time found themselves ready to sink under the pressure of their misfortunes, their city having never before been exposed to such imminent danger. Every thing at present seemed to conspire to their ruin. After they had been haraffed four-and-twenty years by a most cruel and destructive foreign war, they entertained hopes of enjoying fome repose, and re-ostablishing their affairs; instead of which, a numerous army arises out of their own bowels, threatening them with immediate destruction. All the citizens of Carthage drew their particular subsistence from the rents or revenues of their lands, and the public expences from the tribute paid from Africa; all which they were not only deprived of at once, but, what is much worse, had it turned intirely against them. They were c destitute of arms and forces either for sea or land; of all necessary preparations for the fultaining of a fiege, or the equipping of a fleet. They fuffered all the calamities incident to the most ruinous civil war, and, to complete their misery, had not the least prospect of receiving affistance from any foreign friend or ally .

SUCH was the present melancholy situation of affairs at Carthage, which the Car- The true cauthaginians had, in a great measure, themselves occasioned, by their numerous instances ses of this reof cruelty, injustice, and ill conduct. During the last war, they had most tyrannically oppressed all the African nations subject to them, by imposing excessive tributes upon them, in the exaction of which no allowance was made for poverty, or the extremes of misery. They never sent such governors into the provinces as were d likely to win the affections of the people by their lenity and moderation, but fuch only as would most sleece them, in order to fit out sleets, and raise armies, and by that means the most administer to the ambition of the republic, where Hanno at that time governed with almost an absolute sway. This being considered, it cannot certainly appear strange, that the Africans were so easily prevailed upon to engage in this rebellion. At the very first fignal that was made, it broke out, and in a moment became general. The women, who had often, with the deepest affliction, seen their husbands and fathers dragged to prison for non-payment of the most unreasonable taxes and imposts, as likewise suffering cruel deaths for the slightest crimes, shewed themselves every-where extremely active in forwarding a revolt. They not e only entered into an affociation to annoy, by all possible methods, so barbarous and inhuman an enemy, but likewife with pleasure gave up all their ornaments to contribute towards the expences of the war. Mathos and Spendius therefore, by such seafonable and large supplies, found themselves enabled, not only to animate their soldiers by a prompt payment of the sums promised them, but likewise to settle a sufficient fund for all the future exigencies of the army; in which, fays Polybius, they extend their views to futurity d. THE Carthaginians, notwithstanding their deplorable circumstances, did not The Carthagidespond, but pursued all the measures necessary to put themselves into a posture of hisns make f defence. As Hanno had already distinguished himself in their service, by conquering to reduce the a territory of good extent on the confines of Hecatompolis, they appointed him com-mercenaries to mander in chief of all their forces. Troops they levied both for land and fea-fervice, reason. horse as well as foot. All citizens, capable of bearing arms, were mustered; the horse exercised with great diligence and application; mercenaries invited from all parts; many new galleys built, and all the old ones refitted. In short, the most acted like wife men, who do not only look to the prefent occasion, but likewise but even to reduce them to reason by sorce of arms.

In the mean time Mathos and Spendius, having an army of seventy thousand men at their devotion, began the military operations. They laid siege to Utica and Hip-extraordinary efforts were made, not only to repel all the attempts of the mutineers, * Polyb. & Diopor. ubi fup. d PolyB. ubi fup. e Idem ibid.

pacra at one and the same time, and pushed on both those sieges with the utmost vigour. a Spendius de-fiege Utica and But as they were carried on by detachments drawn from the army for that pur-Hippacra at pose, they remained with the main body of their forces at Tunes, and thereby cut the same time, off all communication betwixt Cartbage and the continent of Africa. This greatly streightened the Carthaginians, whose capital was thereby held in a kind of blockade. The Africans likewise harassed them by perpetual alarms, advancing to the very walls of Cartbage by day, as well as by night, and treating with the utmost cruelty every Hanno fent against them, moho behaves very imprudensity.

Carthaginian that fell into their hands f. Hanno, a general more to be esteemed for his diligence in making military preparations, than his conduct in time of action, notwithstanding the reputation he had acquired by the conquest above-mentioned, marched to the relief of Utica with a good body of forces, an hundred elephants, and a large train of battering-engines. b Having taken a view of the enemy, he immediately attacked their entrenchments, and, after an obstinate dispute, by the help of his elephants, forced them, and made himself master of their camp. As the (G) elephants did great execution, the merce-

f POLYB. ubi fup.

(G) If we remember right, no mention is made by the antient historians of the Carthaginians using elephants in war, till the time of the first Punic war. It is certain Plutarch takes no notice of them, when he gives us a description of the arrangement of the Carthaginian forces just before the battle on the banks of the Crimesus; nor Diodorus, when he describes the dispositions of the Carthaginian armies before their various engagements with Dionysius and Agathocles. This countenances Gisbertus Cuperus's opinion, who afferts, that elephants never formed part of an army in Europe, till after the time of Alexander the Great, who took many of those animals from Porus an Indian king; which occasioned their being known and used by his successors afterwards in Greece; for if their military use had been known by the Sicilians before, or even at that period of time, that people would most certainly have joined them with their other forces in some of the earliest wars they were engaged in; which, from the silence of all historians mentioning the Sicilian wars, it is plain they never did. It follows there-fore, that they were not used in Sicily before the interval above-mentioned, which was the most likely part of Europe for them to be known in, by reason of its vicinity to Libys, which produced them. It seems to follow likewise, that the Carthaginians did not intermix them with their troops before that period, fince history could not have omitted taking notice of fo formidable a part of their armies, had they been a part of them; especially as we find afterwards, that almost in all battles wherein they were concerned, they were, in a manner, the fole cause of victory. We cannot help further remarking, that, unless we are greatly deceived, no mention is made of armed chariots after the introduction of elephants into military engagements, nor of elephants before the last time armed chariots are mentioned in any battles the Carthaginians had with their enemies. This, if true, as we persuade ourselves it is, will point out to us the interval, in which chariots were first disused, and elephants introduced amongst the Carthaginians, viz. betwixt the year before Christ 309. When Agashoeles defeated Hanno and Bomilcar, the last time we hear of chariots in the Carthaginian armies, and the year 262. before the christian æra, when the Romans routed Hanno before Agrigentum, the first time we find elephants mentioned in them; and not only fo, but likewise fully prove, that the custom of fighting with elephants was adopted by the peo-ple under confideration in the room of that which before prevailed of engaging with chariots. What firengthens this is, that those nations, who, it is probable, knew nothing of elephants, as the Britons, Gauls, &c. had chariots in use amongst them, till they were conquered by the Romans, as is evident from Diodorus, Casar, and Dio. Pyrrhus was the first who brought them into Italy; and that the Romans had little or no knowledge of them for a considerable time after that prince's death, appears from the defeat Regular received from Xantippus, occasioned, in a great measure, by the Carthaginian elephants, of which the Romans were so much afraid, that, for two years afterwards, they durst not look the enemy in the face in Sicily. It likewise further appears from the overthrow Cacilius gave Afdrubal near Panormus, when he took most of the enemy's elephants, and fent them to Rome, as a great curiosity. According to Pansanias, the Indians in Asia, and the Libyans in Africa, were the first nations that used elephants in battles, others only esteeming them on account of the ivory they produced. The Persians, Lydians, and neighbouring nations, antiently intermixed camels with their troops, as in after-ages they did elephants. Though from Herodotus, Plato, and others, it is sufficiently evident, that Egyps produced elephants, particularly that part of it bordering upon Ethiopia; yet they were not known in that country as military animals, till the time of the Ptolemies. From Egypt, it is probable, the practice of fighting with them foread into Cyrenaica, the people of which region, in all likelihood, might communicate it to their neighbours the Carthaginians. Neither the Jews, Asyrians, Babylonians, Phoenicians, Arabs, Ethiopians, nor even the Medes and Persians, ever brought elephants into the field before the reign of Alexander the Great. King Juba in Philoftratus intimates, that the Moors and Libyans, in very early times, fought with elephants; which notion feems likewise to be countenanced by Ælian. Lucretius affirms the Carthaginians to have invented this method of fighting; but as fuch an opinion runs counter to the whole stream of antiquity, we shall pay no regard to it (32).

(32) Univers. hist. vol. vi. p. 783, 784. in not. (B). Diod. Sic. l. iv. p. 209. Cas. de bell. Gal. l. iv. Dio Cass. l. lxii. p. 706. in Ner. & alib. ed. Hanov. 1606. Polyb. l. i. Pausan. l. i. S. Jul. Frontin. strat. l. ii. c. 4. ex. 12. Xenoph. in Cyropad. l. vii. Polyan. strat. l. vii. c. 2. Herodot. l. ii. Plat. in crit. Xenoph. ubi sup. l. vi. pass. Ælian. de animal. l. xvii. c. 36. Exech. c. xxv. ver. 5. Rex Juba apud Philostrat. in vit. Apollon. Tyan. l. ii. c. 6. Ælian. var. hist. l. xii. c. 55. Lucret. l. v. Vide Bochart. Phal. l. iv. c. 26. & Gisbert. Cuper. de elephantis, in num. obv. exercitat. edit. ab Albert. Henric. de Sallengre, in nov. thesaur. antiquitat. Romanar. tom. iii, Haga-Comit. 1719.

Ji [

C.

7

Ú

Y

άı

21 ß

y,

a naries lost a vast number of men in the action, and consequently the advantage gained was so considerable, that it might have proved decisive, had Hanno made a proper use of it. But not entertaining a right idea of these veteran troops, who had learned, under the conduct of Hamilear in Sicily, to sly before an enemy, sace about, and attack their pursuers, in one and the same day, as occasion should require, he imagined himself to have routed a body of raw, undisciplined Africans and Numidians, who, upon any defeat, generally retired into the heart of the country; and therefore entering the town, lay there in great security, his troops in the mean time, ordered to guard the camp, being every-where off their duty. The mercenaries, who, after Hanno's victory, had rallied their shattered forces upon a neighbouring eminence; b strong by its situation, and covered with a wood, where they had posted themselves;

According to Dr. Hyde, the most usual name of the elephant in India is bari or bri; from whence, it is probable, the Latin words barrus, barritus, ebur, &c. were derived. Isidore adds some weight to this, when he tells us, that, in the Indian language, an elephant is called barro. Martinius makes the elephant to be named in the Chaldee beira; which probably was likewise the Ethiopic name, or nearly related to it, since there is a great affinity betwixt the Ethiopic and the Chaldes; and, in confirmation of this fentiment, Horace's scholiast interprets the word barri of the elephants of Ethiopia. mal under consideration went likewise almost all over the east by the appellation phil or pil, and even in Egypt and Ethiopia; though, in the last country, that animal is now called nage, and by the Copts delphinos. In some parts of India the elephants were named bosare, according to Arrian; in others, if Ælian may be credited, prasii and taxila, from the names of the places where they were produced. The Moors and Carthaginians styled an elephant cafar, as we learn from Spartian and Servius. derive the word elephas or exeque from phil, with the Arabic article al prefixed; others from the Hebrew verb alaph, he learned, the elephant, according to Pliny, Arrian, and others, being an animal of furprifing docility; and lastly, others from the Hebrew aleph or eleph, fignifying an ox, a leader, or indeed any large quadruped. Hesychius uses the words pirissa and elephas as synonymous terms. So much

The Carthaginians generally posted these animals in front, in order to strike the greater terror into the enemy, as we learn from the manner in which Xantippus, Hannibal, Mago, &cc. drew up their armies. This seems a farther proof, that they immediately succeeded armed chariots, which had the same situation assigned them in the Carthaginian armies. Sometimes however they were distributed in both wings, as appears from Livy. The elephants made use of by the Carthaginians in battles were generally, if not always, Indian elephants, which much exceeded the Libyan in strength and magnitude. Each of these had a wooden tower sastened to his back, with twenty-two warriors in it, and an Indian to manage the beast, which he did with the utmost dexterity. The Libyan elephants were not able to carry above six or seven men, as Gesner and Aldrovandus have proved from Livy, Pliny, and Solinus. In the first book of the Maccabees, Antiochus Empator is said to have brought against the Jews several Indian elephants, with towers on their backs, containing thirty-two men apiece, with an Indian guide. Philostratus says, that an Indian elephant as much exceeded in fize one of Libya, as this last did a Ny/ean horse; and Pliny tells us, that the African elephants were so much afraid of the Indian, that they could not bear the fight of them; which is confirmed by Livy and Polybius, who inti-mate, that the Libyan elephants could neither bear the noise nor smell of the Indian. These last animals, according to Ælian, were nine cubits high, and five broad. The Romans called the elephant bos Luca, or bos Lucana, because they first saw that creature in Lucania, and used the word bos to denote any great animal. That nation first placed elephants in their armies in the year of Rome 555. in the confulate of P. Sulpicius Galba and C. Aurelius Cotta. As the Carthaginian soldiers were exercised by their officers, so their elephants were trained up and exercised by the Indian guides. By their monstrous fize, filthy smell, terrible noise, and prodigious strength, as well as the efforts of the garrisons on their backs, they generally threw the enemy into confusion, and made great havock amongst them. The Indians, that managed them, appeared in a dress the most proper to heighten the consternation of the enemy, and began the fight with the utmost fury. No horses but the Numidian, which were accustomed to them, could approach the Indian elephants; and therefore the enemy's cavalry was foon put to the rout by them. Sometimes, by being piercod with darts, they became so enraged, as to turn upon their own men, treading vast numbers of the foldiers to death, which was their common method of destroying those they attacked; though sometimes with their trunk or probosis they dispatched them. The Romans also sometimes, by firing the castles on their backs, forced them to recoil upon their own troops, which, in such a recoil upon their own troops, which, in such a case, they did not sail of putting into disorder. When this happened, the Carthaginians themselves were obliged to kill them; which they did very expeditiously, by a method Asarabal discovered, and which we find described by Livy. These are the principal points relating to the manner of fighting with elephants, particularly amongst the Carthaginians, as far as we can collect from the authors, who have been the most explicit on this subject. The natural history of the elephant our readers may executed tural history of the elephant our readers may expect from us in another note (34).

(33) Thom. Hyde in lib. de ludis orientalib. p. 93. Isidor. in orig. l. xii. Matth. Martin. lex. philolog. in voce Elephas. Schol. in Hor. epod. xii. Sidon. Apollinar. carm. 23. Pomp. Fest. in voc. Barrire. Arrian. de reb. Indic. Plin. l. viii. c. 7. Cic. epist. fam. 1. l. vii. Schind. pentaglot. p. 1428. Ælian. in bist. animal. l. xiii. c. 12. Spartian. in Æl. Ver. Serv. in Æn. 1. Vide etiam Arrian. in peripl. mar. Erythr. Bochart. bierozoic. part. prior. c. 23, 24, &c. & Gisbert. Cuper. ubi sup. (34) Polyb. Diod. Sic. Liv. &c. pass. Veget. de re militar. l. iii. c. 24. 1 Maccab. c. viii. ver. 6. Hornius ad Sulpit. Sever. l. iii. Gesner. & Aldrovand. de eleph. Philostrat. in vit. Apollon. l. ii. c. 6. Plin. l. viii. c. 9. Liv. l. xxxvii. Polyb. l. v. c. 85. Ælian. de animal. l. xiii. c. 8. Verginius apud Varron. l. vi. Veget. ubi sup. c. 24. Modestus in lib. de vocab. rei militar. Enn. fragment. ed. Amst. 1707. p. 305. Sil. Ital. l. ix. & alib. Appian. in Libyca Curt. l. viii. Hirt. in bell. Afric. Plut. in Pyr. Marcel. & Hamib.

being informed of this, poured down upon them, cut many of them off, forced the a rest to sly into the town, retook and plundered the camp, and seized upon all the provisions, military stores, &c. brought from Cartbage to the relief of the besieged. Nor was this the only error committed by Hanno; another instance of his military incapacity soon discovered itself. Notwithstanding he lay encamped in the most advantageous manner near a town called Gorza (H), at which place he twice overthrew the enemy, and had it in his power to have totally ruined them, he yet neglected to improve these advantages, and even suffered the mercenaries to possess themselves of the isthmus, which joined the peninsula, on which Cartbage stood, to the continent of Africa 4.

Hamilcar commands the Carthaginians in his room.

Such repeated mistakes, which had almost proved fatal to the republic, highly b displeased the Carthaginians, and induced them once more to place Hamilear Barcas at the head of the forces. This could not but be extremely mortifying to Hanno, who had always been an inveterate enemy to the Barchine faction, and of course insuse new life into Hamiltar, and his adherents, who undoubtedly, during Hanno's influence, were excluded from all posts in the administration. Hamilear, in all respects, answered the high idea his countrymen had entertained of him. He marched against the enemy with an army of about ten thousand men, horse and foot, and seventy elephants, all the troops the Carthaginians could at that time affemble for their defence; which is a full proof of the great extremities to which they were then reduced. As Mathos, after he had made himself master of the isthmus, had posted proper detach- c ments in two passes on two hills facing the continent, and guarded the bridge over the Bagrada, which, through Hanno's neglect, he had taken, Hamilcar saw little probability of engaging him upon equal terms, or indeed of coming at him. He was therefore obliged to have recourse to a stratagem at this critical conjuncture, especially as Mathos lay encamped with his army at a village near the bridge, and watched the enemy's motions with the utmost vigilance. Observing, that, upon the blowing of certain winds, the mouth of the river was choaked up with fand, which formed a kind of bar, and rendered the river passable, though with no small difficulty, as long as those winds continued, he halted for some time at the river's mouth, without communicating to any person his design. As soon as the wind savoured his d intended project, he passed the river privately by night, without the least opposition, neither his own men, nor the mercenaries, dreaming of any fuch attempt. Immediately after his passage, he drew up the troops in order of battle, and advancing into the plain, where his elephants were capable of acting, moved towards Mathos, who was posted at the village near the bridge. This action greatly redounded to Hamilear's glory, being of to daring a nature, that it equally surprised the malecontents and the Carthaginians e.

And defeats the mercenaries. The Africans being informed, that Hamilear succeeded Hanno in the command of the Cartbaginian army, that he had already passed the Bagrada, and was marching at the head of his forces to attack their camp, were thrown into the utmost consternation. They very well knew, that they had now to deal not with a man of Hanno's genius, but with the greatest captain of the age; a captain, from whom they themselves had learned the art of war, and who was infinitely superior to all their generals in every branch of it. However, Spendius, receiving intelligence of the enemy's motions, drew a body of ten thousand men out of Mathos's camp, with which he attended Hamilear on one side, and ordered sisteen thousand from Utica to observe him on the other,

d Polyb. ubi fup. e Idem ibid.

(H) It may be collected from Polybius, that the town of Gorza was fituated in the neighbourhood of Utica, and not far from the isthmus or neck of land joining the peninsula on which Carthage stood to the continent of Africa, though the situation of it cannot be precisely determined. It is probable the Punic name was Goza or Gaza, since the Greeks frequently inserted the letter R or P in such proper names, as appears from Bochart; and Gaza or Goza (a permutation of vowels, especially O and A, being very common in the Hebrew and Phanician proper names, when written and pronounced by the Greeks) was the Carthaginian name of a town in Sicily, as well as the Phoenician name of a fortress in Palestine, or, as the prophet calls it, Peleseth. Be this as it will, that not only Gaza or Goza, but likewise Chorsa or Goza, is the Punic proper name of a place, cannot be denied, after a perusal of Bochart. No author, either antient or modern, if we remember right, except Polybins in this passage, has so much as mentioned it (35).

.

2

ľ

á į(

a. C

35 ja Jan

111

1

135 ice i

e of I

12

a thinking by this means to surround the Carthaginians, and cut off both their army and general at one fingle stroke. Hamilear in the mean time advanced with great intrepidity, his troops being ranged in the following manner: the elephants were posted in front, then came the cavalry, and after them the light-armed infantry, being supported by the targeteers, who brought up the rear. But observing the mercenaries to approach him with great temerity, though at the same time with resolution, and as much confidence as if they had been fure of victory, he changed his order of battle in a precipitate manner, still retiring before the enemy, as though he was afraid of them. This motion answered the end proposed; for the mercenaries, looking upon it as the effect of fear, and confequently as a tacit acknowledgment of their b valour and superiority, fell upon him with great sury, but without any discipline or Hamilear therefore facing about in an instant, and his horse behaving with extraordinary bravery, the enemy were foon put to flight; when meeting a body of their own men coming to their relief, and mistaking them for the Carthaginians, they engaged them; upon which a dreadful flaughter enfued. In fine, Hamilear gave the malecontents a total overthrow, in which they had fix thousand men killed, and two thousand taken prisoners. The rest sled, some to the town at the bridge, and others to the camp at Utica. Hamiltar did not give the enemy time to recover from their defeat, as Hanno before had none, but purfued them with great ardour to the village near the bridge before-mentioned; which he entered without opposition, c the mercenaries flying in great confusion to Tunes. Many towns, which had revolted to the enemy, terrified by this defeat, submitted to the Carthaginians; others Hamilear reduced by force. In short, the Carthaginians, finding that Hamilear had feized many of the enemy's advantageous posts, were greatly animated by his conduct, and doubted not but he would soon put a happy conclusion to this destructive war f.

Notwithstanding these disasters, Mathos pushed on the siege of Hippo with Hamilcar of great vigour, and appointed Spendius, and Autaritus commander of the Gauls, with filed to Nataa strong body of troops, to observe the motions of Hamilear, advising them above all things to guard against a surprize; which, considering the abilities of that general, d as well as his superiority in horse and elephants, was a very wholsome admonition.

At the same time he solicited the Numidians and neighbouring Africans to send him a proper number of recruits, exhorting them to make their utmost efforts at the prefent juncture, which feemed to be the only opportunity left them of recovering their liberty, to affert their independency, and throw off the yoke of the Carthaginians. Spendius and Autaritus therefore, at the head of a choice detachment of fix thousand men, drawn out of the camp at Tunes, and two thousand Gallic horse, attended Hamilcar, approaching him as near as they could with fafety, and keeping close to the skirts of the mountains, as they had been advised. At last Spendius, having received a strong reinforcement of Africans and Numidians, and possessing himself of all the e heights surrounding the plain, in which Hamiltar lay encamped, resolved not to let slip so favourable an opportunity of attacking him. Accordingly he placed the Numidians in the rear, and the Africans in front, whilst he himself, with his first detachment, was resolved to charge the enemy in slank; and having made this disposition, boldly advanced towards the Carthaginians. Had a battle ensued, Hamilear and his whole army must, in all human probability, have been totally ruined; but here his good fortune interposing, saved them both. It happened, that at that time one Na-of the present war, had been a great promoter of the Cartbaginian interest, on account f of the friendship, that had subsisted many years betwire his father and that nation; and being now charmed with the great worth of Hamilear, was determined to renew his former good understanding with Carthage, and not suffer so brave a man to be sacrificed. He therefore, with an hundred Numidian horse, approached the Carthaginian lines, acquainting one of their advanced guards, that he had something of importance to communicate to the general. As the Cartbaginians shewed themselves a little diffident of him, he immediately difmounted, and, leaving his horse and arms with the guard that escorted him, went directly to Hamilear's tent, without the least distrust or suspicion. He then informed Hamilcar, that he was well disposed towards the Cartha-ravasus, a young Numidian nobleman, eminent for his personal merit, commanded a body of Numidians in the enemy's army. This nobleman, before the breaking out ginian nation in general, but that to contract a friendship with him, for whom he a had the most prosound veneration and esteem, was the height of his ambition. Hamilear, greatly admiring so generous, polite and gallant an action, made him an equal return of gallantry, politeness and generosity. He made him his absolute confident in all points whatsoever. He took him for his companion, imparting to him his most secret designs; and, to crown all, afterwards gave him his daughter in marriage. Upon the same of this event, two thousand Numidians came over in a body to Hamilear, who, strengthened by such a seasonable reinforcement, found himself in a condition to give Spendius and Autaritus battle. The sight was obtinate and bloody, and the victory for a long time in suspense; but the young Numidian most eminently distinguishing himself, and the Carthaginian elephants bearing down b all before them, the mercenaries were at last intirely overthrown. Spendius and Autaritus escaped by slight, but left ten thousand of their men dead upon the spot, besides four thousand taken prisoners. All the prisoners, who were willing to take on in the Carthaginian service, Hamilear received amongst his troops, supplying them with the arms of the soldiers, who had fallen in the engagement. To the rest he gave free liberty to go where-ever they pleased, on condition that they should never for the suture bear arms against the Carthaginians. However, he thought proper to acquaint them, that as many violators of this agreement as should hereafter fall into his hands, must expect to suffer death without mercy s.

The chiefs of the mercenaries guilty of great cruelty.

Mathos, Spendius, and Autaritus, the chiefs of the malecontents, fearing that this c affected lenity of Hamiltar might occasion a defection among their troops, thought the only expedient left them to prevent it would be, to put them upon some action fo execrable and shocking in its own nature, as should deprive them of all hopes of ever being reconciled to the enemy. Accordingly, having affembled them in a formal manner, as though something of moment was to have been imparted to them, a messenger, as had been before concerted, appeared with fictitious letters from the mercenaries in Sardinia, who had followed the example of the Africans, giving them advice of a fecret delign formed by some of their comrades, in conjunction with Gifeo, to rescue that general, and all his attendants, out of prison at Tunes, where they had been so long detained. Spendius on this occasion made a speech to the soldiers, d wherein he exhorted them not to be imposed upon by Hamilcar's pretended clemency, fince this was only intended for a bait to decoy their whole body into his hands, that he might take vengeance of them all at once. He further advised them to have a narrow eye upon Gisco, infinuating, that the escape of an officer of such instruction and capacity might be attended with the most satal consequences. He had scarce finished, when another courier arrived, as was given out, from Tunes, intimating, that the plot was upon the point of being carried into execution. Hereupon Autaritus, addressing himself to the soldiery, moved, in support of what Spendius had advanced, that whoever should shew any disposition to repose the least considence in the Carthaginian promises or infinuations, should be deemed a traitor; and in fine gave it as e his opinion, that Gifco, and all the Carthaginians with him, ought immediately to be put to death. Autaritus, being very popular in the army, and supposed to have a perfect knowledge of the Carthaginians, as having refided long amongst them, and being a perfect master of their language, was listened to with great attention. His speech in fine made such an impression, that the whole assembly expressed themselves of the same sentiments, though some of every nation joined in a petition, that as Gisco had been a common friend and benefactor to them all, he might be dispatched without any torture; but the gross of the army being composed of such a variety of nations, and not understanding the matter of the petition, no regard was paid to it. In conformity therefore to that savage brutality so natural to them, the mercenaries $ first stoned to death all the prisoners they had taken from the Carthaginians in the late engagements, who were foon after interred by their relations; and then, at the command of Spendius, executed Gifeo, and seven hundred Carthaginians with him, as the vilest malefactors. Their heads were cut off, their bodies dismembered, and afterwards thrown breathing into a hole prepared for them. The Carthaginians, being apprifed of these inhuman cruelties, were most sensibly touched with them, and ordered their generals to retaliate them upon the murderers with the utmost severity. In the mean time Hamilear, sending an herald to demand the remains of his country:5 i

71

11

ود. ما نو

Š

Ś 25 E

10

117

لمنته Hs 16

il 15 sabil jejid

iji nTā i

10 2

k ca

35 the

ıtt.

being n, in ereij.

K.h

a men, in order to pay them the last sad office, received for answer, that whoever prefumed hereafter to come upon that errand, should meet with Gifco's fate. They moreover came to an immediate resolution to treat all such Carthaginians as should fall into their hands with the same barbarity. As for their countrymen in the Cartonginian fervice, who should happen to be taken prisoners, they passed a decree, first to cut off their hands, and then fend them to Carthage; which bloody resolution they executed with great rigour and punctuality. Such infernal practices as these, so contrary to the laws of nature and all nations, can never be sufficiently detested. However, as they are on one side sufficient proofs of the more than serine disposition of the Africans, they may on the other likewise be considered as strong intimations of b Carthaginian oppression, since human nature, wicked as it is, seems scarce capable of fuch cruelties, except it be in the highest degree irritated and inflamed. reflection, so naturally occurring to us from what has been just related, we could not avoid. As for others, a large field for which must necessarily open itself to all our curious and intelligent readers, we are obliged to pass them by untouched; at the fame time observing, that a perusal of Polybius, in the point before us, will in a good measure supply our deficiency in this particular h.

Hamilear, being determined to revenge the barbarous treatment of his countrymen, Utica and Hipordered Hanno, who, it seems, at that time commanded a separate body, to join pacra revolt to him, that they might act with the greater vigour against the enemy. In order to deter the mercena-the malecontents from such enormous proceedings for the future, he threw all the ries.

prisoners, that fell into his hands, to wild beasts, to be devoured by them, being convinced, that compassion served only to render them more sierce and untractable. And now, when the Carthaginians were just beginning, as it were, to breath, and recover their spirits, several unlucky accidents concurred again to depress them. By reason of a misunderstanding betwixt the generals, nothing could be undertaken against the enemy; a great supply of provisions and military stores, of which they were in extreme necessity, coming to them from Emporium by sea, were all cast away in a ftorm; Sardinia, which had always served them as a magazine in their greatest streights, was totally lost, as we shall hereafter have occasion to observe; and, to complete all their other misfortunes, they received intelligence of the defection of Utica and Hippacra, the two only cities which, till then, had preserved their allegiance, and always adhered inviolably to the republic, even when Agathocles and the Romans made their descents in Africa. The citizens, not satisfied with entering into an alliance with Mathos and Spendius, massacred the Carthaginian garrison, confifting of five hundred men, throwing their bodies over the walls; nay, to imitate their good allies in all their amiable qualities, they refused them burial, though the Carthaginians, by their embassadors, in most pressing terms desired this favour of them. The mercenaries, animated by such success, advanced to the very walls of Cartbage, with an intention to lay siege to that city 1.

THE Carthaginians, being apprised of the division betwixt their generals, and seeing Hiero affils the e the fatal effects of it, resolved to separate them, but lest the determination of this Carthaginians. point intirely to the army, who having had long experience of the great merit of Hamilear, continued him in his command; upon which Hanno was recalled a fecond time to Carthage, and Hannibal, an officer more agreeable to Hamilcar, fent to supply his place. Upon Hannibal's arrival in the camp, affairs foon began to take a happy turn. There being now a perfect harmony betwixt the commanders, the operations were not clogged as formerly; they fent out detachments to plunder and lay waste the country, in order to cut off all subsistence from the enemy; which they happily effected, destroying or carrying off all the forage and provisions. This however did not intirely relieve the garrison of Carthage, which was reduced to great f extremities. The Carthaginians therefore were obliged to have recourse to their friends, and particularly to Hiero king of Syracuse; who granted what was demanded of him, both now and throughout the whole course of this war. That prince, as Polybius observes, acted according to the maxims of true policy on this occasion; since, if Carthage had been now destroyed, Rome would have had no rival to contend with in any future times, and therefore he himself might soon have lain at the mercy of the Romans, without a possibility of being relieved by any neighbouring power k.

h Idem ibid. & Diop. Sic. in excerpt. Vales.

POLYB. ubi fup.

k Idem ibid. & ZONAR.

THEY

Vol. VI. No 11.

THEY also applied to the Romans for affistance at this critical juncture, tho' they a had, fince the conclusion of the last treaty, disobliged them. At the beginning of this war, they seized upon several Roman vessels trading to the coasts of Africa, for supplying the enemy with military stores and provisions, and detained the crews, confishing of five hundred men, in custody. The Romans, being incensed at this treatment, threatened the Carthaginians with their refentment, if they did not release the prisoners, and restore them their ships. The Carthaginians, either out of a principle of fear or generofity, immediately fent both the men and ships to Rome, and that in so handsome a manner, as gave the Romans intire satisfaction. The Romans therefore, not to be behind hand with them in point of politeness, at this time sent them all the prisoners, that still remained in their hands since the late war, without b ransom, ordered their merchants to affift Cartbage with what it wanted, and prohibited all manner of commerce with the Africans. At the same time both the malecontents of Africa and Sardinia offered to submit to them, and to put them into the immediate possession both of Sardinia and the town of Utica; which overture they refused. These instances of success animating the Carthaginians, they bore the satigues of the siege with great alacrity. In fine, Mathos and Spendius, being extremely haraffed by Hamilear, who, by stratagems and rencounters, daily cut off great numbers of their men, and so streightened for want of provisions, that they apprehended a speedy famine, found themselves obliged to abandon the siege!

Notwithstanding this disgrace, the generals of the malecontents took the c sude offortune. field with an army of fifty thousand effective men, having been joined by one Zarxas, the head of an African hord or canton, with all his people capable of bearing They watched Hamilcar's motions, but kept on the hills, carefully avoiding coming down into the plains, on account of Naravajus's Numidian horse, and the Carthaginian elephants. Hamilear, being much superior to any of their generals in every branch of the military art, frequently outwitted them; fometimes dispossessing them of their advantageous posts; at other times drawing them into ambuscades; and often defeating them in rencounters, by which means he cut off abundance of their men. If any of their foldiers straggled ever so little from the main body of the army, they certainly fell into his hands, and were thrown by him to wild beafts, d that he might, in some measure, retaliate the inhuman cruelty of Spendius. In short, he haraffed them a thousand ways; which as it greatly dejected them, so it inspired his own troops with fresh courage and vigour. At last, he surprised them when they least expected it, and shut them up in a post, which was so situated, that it was impossible for them to get out of it. Here he kept them streightly besieged, lying at eale in his camp, and being plentifully supplied with all kinds of necessaries. The mercenaries, not during to venture a battle, and finding themselves not able to get off, began to fortify their camp, and furround it with ditches and entrenchments. Conscious of their enormous guilt, they despaired of mercy, and therefore concluded it would be to no purpose to make any overtures to Hamilear. They were soon so e forely pressed by famine, that they were obliged to eat one another; Divine Providence, says Polybius, thus avenging upon themselves the inhumanity they had exercifed on others. As they could not entertain the least thought of peace, or of coming to an accommodation, after having been so deeply concerned in such bloody scenes, and knew what punishments would be inflicted upon them, in case they fell alive into the hands of the enemy, they saw they had no resource lest, and therefore prepared themselves for the measures despair should dictate to them. The forces they looked for from Tunes came not to their aid as was expected, and the famine made daily large strides amongst them. They first found themselves under the necessity of eating their prisoners, then their slaves, and last of all their comrades. Prompted f therefore to it by the extremity of mifery they fuffered, they infifted, that Spendius, Autaritus, and Zarxas, their leaders, should in person make proposals to Hamilear, and to that end have a conference with him. Accordingly, having obtained a fafe conduct from him, a treaty was agreed upon, and peace concluded, upon the following terms: That ten of the ringleaders of the malecontents should be left intirely to the mercy of the Carthaginians; and that the troops should all be disarmed, every man retiring only in a fingle coat. The treaty was no fooner concluded, than Hamilear feized upon the negotiators themselves, by virtue of the first article, which savoured not a little of a Punic subtlety. The army being informed, that their chiefs were under arrest, and at the same time ignorant of the articles of the treaty, had immediately recourse to arms, suspecting that they were betrayed; but Hamiltar, drawing out his army in order of battle, immediately furrounded them, and either cut them to pieces, or trod them to death with his elephants. The place, where this bloody tragedy was acted, was called Prion (1). The number of the wretches, who perished, amounted to above forty thousand ...

AFTER this complete victory, Hamilcar, Hannibal, and Naravasus, scoured the Mathos takes country, and many of the revolted towns returned to their obedience. According Hannibal prito the plan of operations, Hamilear immediately invested Tunes, into which place cifes him.

b Mathos (K) retired with all his remaining forces. Hannibal's quarter was on the road leading to Carthage, and Hamilcar's on the opposite side. The army was no sooner encamped, than Hamilear caused Spendius, and the rest of the prisoners, to be led out in view of the besieged, and crucified near the walls. Mathos, by this, was apprifed of the fate he must expect to meet with, and therefore undoubtedly rendered much more attentive to his own defence. Observing, that Hannibal did not keep so good a guard as he ought, he made a fally, attacked his quarters, killed many of his men, took feveral prisoners, among whom was Hannibal himself, and plun-Taking the body of Spendius from the cross on which it was fixed, dered his camp

c ction, who all expired in exquisite torture, were crucified round him; fortune, as Polybius expresses it, giving both sides an opportunity of vying with each other in point of cruelty. Hamilear being at some distance from his collegue, it was some time before his misfortune reached him, and the road betwixt them being impassable, had he received earlier intelligence of the situation of affairs on that side, he could not have moved with any expedition to his affistance. He therefore immediately decamped, and posted himself along the sea-coast, near the mouth of the river he substituted Hannibal there in its place; and thirty Carthaginian prisoners of distin-

Bagrada 1.

á 2

1

7 ş: Te

ş. 3.

o t

řŀ

X...

- 2 Ö

[1] ::1

المراز

[1]: ---!

129

7.10

ة. ا معلنان 1

ICV (

g 07)

0. iż

- d

P.L

THE Carthaginians were greatly terrified at this last disaster; however, they The Libyan omitted no means necessary for their preservation. They sent thirty senators, with war happily d Hanno at the head of them, to confult with Hamilear about the proper measures to concluded by be taken for speedily terminating this cruel and unnatural war, conjuring in the most Hamilton. pressing manner Hanno to be reconciled to Hamiltar, and to sacrifice his private refertment to the public welfare. This, with fome difficulty, was complied with, and the two generals came to a full refolution to act in concert for the good of the republic. The fenate at the same time ordered all the youth, capable of bearing arms, to be pressed into the service, by which means a strong reinforcement being fent to Hamilcar, he soon found himself in a condition to act offensively; so that the Carthaginian affairs began to have a better aspect. Hamilear defeated the enemy in all his rencounters with them, drew Mathos into frequent ambuscades, and gave him e one notable overthrow near Leptis. This reduced him to the necessity of hazarding a decifive battle with the Carthaginians, which proved fatal to him. The leaders on both sides animated their troops, as going to decide their respective sates; upon which an engagement immediately enfued. Victory was not long in suspense, the merce-m Polys. ubi fup.

" Idem ibid.

(I) Polybius says this place was called Prion, from the similitude its figure bore to that a of faw, the Greek word mriw, prion, fignifying that instrument. But this notion, at first fight, appears highly improbable, not to say ridiculous; for, to omit the absurdity of supposing this particular spot to resemble a faw, how can it enter into any person's head, that the Carthaginians should give Greek names to their towns and villages? All the other names of towns this author mentions here, are apparently Punic or Phanician; and therefore it is but reasonable, may natural, to conclude, that this must be so too. The word no peri or pri, fruit, is undoubtedly the original from whence Prion is to be deduced, fince Bochart has demonstrated some names of places near Carthage to have been derived from thence, and fince many antient authors conspire to evince, that this country abounded with spots of ground furpritingly fruitful. Add to this, that the rabbinical word morp prion fignifies a garden; which, no doubt, is so called by the rabbins, on account of its truitfulness or fertility. We cannot take upon us to affirm how near exactly this place was to Carthage; but, according to Polybius, it must have been in the neighbourhood of Tunes (36).

(K) Sir Walter Ralegh, M. Rollin, &c. call this African captain Matho; whereas his true name is Mathos, fince the original word in Polybias is MA- $\Theta\Omega\Sigma$ . So  $A\Theta\Omega\Sigma$ , the proper name of a mountain in Macedonia, in Latin and the modern languages is Athos. Many other examples might be produced to support what is here advanced (37).

(36) Bochart. Chan. l. i. c. 24. Val. Schind. pentaglot. p. 1475, 1476. Vide Polyb. l. i. c. 82, l. iii. c. 23, em in excerpt. legat. 118. & Liv. l. xxxiv. c. 62. (37) Polyb. in loc. citat.

naries

naries flying almost upon the first onset. Most of their army fell upon the field of a battle, and in the pursuit, Mathos, with a few, escaping to a neighbouring town, where he was taken, and carried alive to Carthage. All the revolted towns, except Utica and Hippo, which had behaved in such a manner, as to exclude themselves from all hopes of mercy, returned to their duty upon this defeat. Hamilear, fitting down before those cities, soon reduced them, and thereby concluded this war. Mathos, having adorned the public triumph, was led to execution, and finished, by a painful and ignominious death, a life, that had been polluted with the blackeft treasons, and unparallelled barbarities. From the excesses of cruelty committed in it, Polybius tells us, that this war generally went amongst the Greeks by the name of the inexpiable war. The same excellent author from hence remarks, that those states b must be exposed to the greatest dangers, which hire for their desence a body of foreigners, who are not attached to them either by interest or affection o.

The Romans and a vast Sum from the Cirthaginians.

DURING the Libyan war, the mercenaries in Sardinia declared against the Carthaextore Sardinia ginians, excited thereto by the example of Mathos and Spendius in Africa. They seized upon the person of Bostar, who commanded in the citadel of Olbia, and masfacred both him and the Carthaginian garrison. The senate, apprised of this, sent one Hanno, with a strong reinforcement of troops, to bring the mutineers to reason. Hanno, upon his arrival, was abandoned by his men, who joined the mercenaries, and foon after not only crucified him, but put to the fword all the Carthaginians they could meet with in the island, and possessed themselves of all the strong places there, c though, in a short time, they were expelled from thence by the natives, and forced to take shelter in Italy. The Romans, notwithstanding the friendship they had lately expressed for the Carthaginians, gave countenance and protection to these sugitives, and thereby greatly deviated from those maxims of justice and honour their own writers celebrate them so much for. In fine, they sent the consul Sempronius, on trifling pretences, with a fleet, to reinstate those malecontents, and take possesfion of Sardinia; which the Carthaginians, being now in a manner exhausted, were obliged to cede to them. Not content with this iniquitous act, they obliged the Carthaginians to defray the expence of their armament, and besides extorted from them a fum of twelve hundred talents. Such a perfidious conduct as this could not a fail of heightening the aversion Hamiltar had already conceived to them, and did not a little contribute to the second Punic war, and to those dreadful devastations, which Hannibal afterwards committed in Italy P.

The faithless dealings of Rome with Carthage.

Polybius tells us, that when the Carthaginians made preparations to reduce Sardinia, the Romans pretended to be under terrible apprehensions of their power, as though these preparations had been intended to subvert their republic; and therefore from hence took occasion to declare war against them. This plainly demonstrates, that the Romans at that time were determined to stick at nothing, in order to gratify their ambition, and that they had then a refined genius for villainy. The motives that prompted them to act in a friendly manner towards Carthage, when that state was e in danger of being overturned by its rebellious subjects, were undoubtedly far different from the specious pretext they offered to impose upon the world, viz. a principle They probably confidered, that if the Carthaginians were reduced to the last gasp by the barbarians, with whom they were then engaged in war, they would, by a little kindness, be induced to submit to them at so critical a conjuncture. They likewise, in all probability, were afraid, that the mercenaries would find their way again into Sicily, where they had behaved with fuch bravery, could they have made themselves masters of Carthage, and have dislodged them from thence; both or either of which confiderations were fufficient to determine their conduct as above related. Be this as it will, that the friendly offices the Romans did the Carthaginians f in the time of their great distress were the result of political views, and did not proceed from any noble or generous sentiments, is abundantly evident, not only from their subsequent conduct, but even from several hints given us by their own prejudiced historians q.

Some writers endeavour to palliate this, but in vain.

In order, no doubt, to palliate the conduct of the Romans on this occasion, we are told by some of their writers, that, by the treaty concluded at the end of the first Punic war, the Carthaginians made a cession of Sardinia, as well as Sicily, to the

· Idem ibid. Diop Sic. l. xxv. in excerpt. Vales. P POLYB. ubi sup. Liv. l. xxi. Oros. l. iv. C. 11. ZONAR. ubi sup. c. 19. Appian in Iberic. sub init. POLYB. LIV. &c. ubi fip.

a Ramans. But, notwithstanding the authority of these writers, this is utterly improbable; for, if so, why did not the Romans take immediate possession of it, since the Carthaginians were too weak to oppose them, otherwise they would not have made peace upon such disadvantageous terms? And that they did not take possession of it, is evident from Polybius, an author infinitely superior to those here hinted at, when he affures us, that the mercenary troops in that island rebelled against their masters the Carthaginians. But what serves sufficiently to explain the disposition of the Romans towards the Carthaginians, is an incident that happened foon after, viz. the rebellion of the Corfi, Sardi, and Ligurians, which the Romans pretended to have been fomented by the Carthaginians, in order to have an opportunity of picking a b quarrel with that nation, though Hanno, a young Carthaginian lord, by his great spirit and vivacity, parried the blow. However, some time after, without any tolerable colour or pretext, they affumed to themselves the power of prescribing limits to the Carthaginian conquests in Spain, obliging Asdrubal to engage himself by treaty not to pass the Iberus. Such points of conduct need no comment; they render moit glaring the motives the just and upright Romans acted upon r.

Hamilear, by the happy conclusion of the Libyan war, did not only restore tran-Hamilear quillity to the republic, but greatly extended the Carthaginian conquests in Africa. marches into Finding his country not in a condition to enter into an immediate war with Rome, he Spain. formed a scheme to put it upon a level with that imperious republic, which was, to c make an intire conquest of Spain, that the Carthaginians might have troops capable of coping with the Romans. In order to facilitate the execution of this scheme, he inspired both his fon-in-law Afdrubal and his fon Hannibal with an implacable aversion to the Romans, the great blasters of his and his country's grandeur. Asdrubal did not live to be a feourge to the Romans; but Hannibal brought that proud nation to the very brink of destruction. Immediately after the troubles in Africa were appealed, the fenate fent Hamilcar upon an expedition against the Numidians, notwithstanding his fon-in-law Naravasus was of that nation; which renders it probable, that the Carthaginians had an intention to punish them for joining their discontented mercenaries. Be that as it will, Hamilear gave fresh proofs of his courage and abilid ties in this expedition, fince, by his valour and conduct, he finished it so much to the satisfaction of the republic, that the command of the army destined to act against Spain was given him. Hannibal his fon, at that time but nine years of age, begged, with the utmost importunity, to attend him on this occasion, for that purpose employing all the foothing arts fo common to children of his age, and which have so much power over a loving father. Hamilear therefore granted his request; but ordered him to put his hand upon the altar, and swear, that he would be an irreconcileable enemy to the Romans, and act as such as soon as his age would permit him. He likewise took with him Ajdrubal, after he had bestowed his daughter in marriage upon him. Nepos intimates, that he was obliged to this step, because the censor e took Asdrubal from him, upon a report, that he was more familiar with that youth than was confistent with modesty. However, that biographer at the same time insinuates this report to have been a calumny, and tells us, that, by the Carthaginian laws, it was not permitted any person to separate the son-in-law from the father-inlaw. The military preparations being completed, Hamilear advanced with a powerful army to Abyla (L), and croffing the streights of Hercules, landed in Spain without opposition. He began the operations by incursions into the enemy's country, fixing his head-quarters at Gades, now Cadiz, the capital of the Carthaginian acquisitions in

F LIV. & OROS. ubi sup. EUTROP. I. iii. c. 2. POLYB. & ZONAR. ubi sup. Appian. in Iberic. Aurel. Vict. in C. Lutat. Cat. Vide & Univers. hist. vol. iv. p. 687.

Spain. According to Appian and Polybius, he had two views in this war: first, to put Carthage in a situation to revenge the indignities received from the Romans; and f fecondly, to have an opportunity of being absent from home, the Carthaginian state being at that time miserably distracted by two potent factions, over one of which Herculeum, the flreights of Hercules, but, by the moderns, the streights of Gibraltar. Marcianus Heraelecta, Silius Italicus, and others, take particular notice of them (38).

(38) Marcian. Heracleot. p. 36. Sil. Ital. l. i. ver. 199. Vide & Cellar. geogr. ant. l. iv. 6. 7. p. 930. Vol. VI. 10 L

(L) Abyla, the pillar of Hercules on the African fite, is opposite to the other in Spain called Calpe. They are both confiderable mountains, and have a narrow fea betwixt them, called antiently Fretum

prefided Hanno, Hamilcar's inveterate enemy. However, by the great success he a met with, and the vast reputation he had already acquired, he animated his friends at home, enabling them to carry every point there, and would undoubtedly have come soon to blows with the Romans, had not death prevented his design from taking effect '(M).

And, after many gallant actions, is killed there.

Our hero commanded in Spain nine years, and, during that interval, subdued many warlike nations there. In the course of so long a war, considering how rich a country Spain was, an immense quantity of treasure must necessarily fall into his This he distributed in the most politic manner, partly amongst the troops, and partly amongst the great men at Carthage; by which means he secured his interest with both those powerful bodies. We have received no particular detail of b the actions he was concerned in during the term above-mentioned to be depended upon, only an account of that wherein he fell. The Vettones or Vectones, a nation of Lusitania, being incenfed at the devastations committed in their country by the Carthaginians, drew out all their forces, with an intention to give Hamilear battle. They were joined by many other petty nations, with their reguli at the head of them, who had been plundered and laid under contribution in the same manner. To compass their end, they made use of the following stratagem: they sent before them a vast number of waggons filled with fascines, pitch, sulphur, and other such-like combustible materials, and drawn by oxen, their troops following under arms, and marching in battle-array. The Carthaginians at first ridiculed this seemingly coarse c stratagem; but at last the Spaniards, upon their approaching Hamilear, set fire to these vehicles, driving the beasts amongst the enemy, who soon found themselves obliged to quit their ranks. The Vettones and their allies, observing this, charged

9 APPIAN. in Iberic. Polyb. I. iii. & Liv. ubi fup. Vide Corn. Nep. Aurel. Vict. Eutrop. &c. Val. Max. l. ix. c. 3. Flor. l. ii. c. 6.

(M) According to Diodorus Siculus, after his landing in Spain, he reduced the city of Tartesfus, and gave a memorable defeat to Istolatius, general of the Celtes and Iberians, putting a great number of his men, together with himself and his brother, to the sword. Many of the Celtie nobility likewise perished in the action. Out of the prifoners Hamilear selected three thousand, whom he incorporated with his own troops. But Indortes, one of the Celtic or Iberian general officers, collecting the remains of the army, and receiving a confiderable reinforcement, affembled a body of fifty thousand men, with which he intended to give Hamilear battle. However, his men, consisting partly of veterans terrified by the last overthrow, and partly of new-raised levies, fled, upon the first appearance of the enemy, to a neighbouring eminence, where the Carthaginians surrounded them, and for some time closely befieged them. Indortes, by a stratagem, and by the favour of the night, found means to make his escape; but the greatest part of his army was either cut off, or obliged to furrender at discretion. At last Indortes himself fell into Hamilcar's hands, who, according to the fame author, first put out his eyes, and then, after many insults, crucified him. But this we can scarcely give credit to, fince it is so inconsistent with the character of that general, as given us by Polybius, except we will suppose, that this Indortes had been guilty of some monstrous piece of cruelty towards the Carthaginians. Ten thousand Celtic and Iberian prisoners, that would not take on in the Carthaginian service, Diodorus likewise tells us, Hamilear fet at liberty without ranfom; which countenances the supposition just hinted at. Many cities he also reduced, partly by force, and partly by composition; and had probably made a vast progress, had he not received an express from Carthage, with advice, that a part of Numidia had rebelled against the Cartha-ginians. This obliged him to weaken his army, by lending a strong detachment, under his son-in-law

Asdrubal, to reduce the rebels. Asdrubal soon obliged them to return to their duty, after having put eight thousand of them to the sword, and taken two thousand prisoners. In the mean time Hamilear made himself master of several towns, and built a large city, from its fituation called by the Greeks Acra Leuca, or the White citadel. Some time afterwards he laid fiege to Helice with part of his army, putting the rest into winter-quarters at Acra Leuca. Orisson, prince of the country, being informed, that Hamilear had fent the best part of his army, and all his elephants, to Acra Leuca, advanced with his forces towards the Carthaginians, pretending, that he came with a defign to join them, and thereby facilitate the conquest of the remaining part of the country. Hamilear, giving too much credit to him, was surprised, his body of troops before the town utterly ruined, himself obliged to fly one way, and his sons Astrubal and Hannibal another, that they might not all fall into the enemy's hands. The two last arrived at Acra Leuca, Hamiltar only being pursued by Orisson; but the pursuit was so hot, that he was obliged to attempt passing a rapid river, in the midst of which, by the violence of the stream, he was forced from his horse, and drowned. This is the account given by Diodorus Siculus, which abounds with fo many improbable particulars, and is fo contradictory to the character of that excellent general, as given us even by that author himself, that no great stress is to be laid upon it. However, we must desire our readers to observe, that the fragments of this useful and excellent author are not, for the most part, of equal authority with that part of the body of his history preserved to us, being much more corrupted, and consequently standing in need of many more emendations. That this is true of the fragment we have here given our readers a translation of, will appear from an attentive perufal of it, fince its parts do not hang together in a proper manner (39).

a them with fuch bravery, that they foon put them to flight, killing many upon the the spot, amongst whom was the general himself. This relation we have extracted from Appian, Nepos, Frontinus, and Zonaras; but must own, that most, if not all, the circumstances of it are omitted by Polybius. That excellent historian only tells us in general, that Hamiltar came to an end worthy his exalted character, dying gloriously in the field of battle at the head of his troops. And indeed was not Polybius's authority sufficient to support him in the point before us, yet the nature of the thing plainly enough confutes the other writers; for is it possible to imagine, that so expert and famed a general as Hamilear, a general who was so perfect a master of the military art, who, by an infinity of the most refined stratagems, had so frequently b outwitted the greatest captains of the age, should at last be over-reached by so mean an artifice? This, we fay, is incompatible with the character of that commander, as given us by Polybius, Diodorus Siculus, and even these very authors themselves; for which reason we must caution our readers not to be over-hasty in giving their affent to it. Upon Hamilear's death, the army elected his fon in-law Ajdrubal, then the Carthaginian admiral, to succeed him: (N).

THE senate, being apprised of the choice the army had made, after they had Asdrubal choconfirmed it, fent a throng reinforcement of troops to Afdrubal, to enable him not fen to succeed only to preserve, but to extend their conquests. As the new general had been him. trained up in the art of war by Hamilear, under whom he had ferved fo many cam-

c paigns, the people in general entertained a high idea of him, though Hanno, and his adherents, did their utmost to depreciate his merit. Afdrubal answered their expectations, behaving with fuch wisdom and address, as enabled him to support Hamilear's friends both at Carthage and in the army. To secure his predecessor's acquisitions, he built a city, which, by the advantage of its situation, the commodiousness of its harbours, its fortifications, and flow of wealth, which its great commerce produced, became afterwards one of the most considerable cities in the world. Some people, at that time, called it the New city, others Carthage, nothing being more common in that age, as well as many of the preceding, than to denominate new-built cities after the names of those to which their founders belonged. It is known at this day d by the name of Carthagena, from whence one of the principal fortresses of the Spaniards in the West-Indies at present is so called ".

THE Romans, receiving intelligence of the great progress the Carthaginians made The great proin Spain, began to have a watchful eye over them. They could not but imagine, gress of Aidrustal that both Hamilear and Asarubal had something more grand in view than the redu-checked by the ction of Spain, and had formed a remote design, vast in its nature, which they pro-Romans. posed gradually putting in execution. They were not long at a loss to find out whom this must be levelled at, as easily discovering, that their republic was, of all other states, the most diametrically opposite in point of views and interest to that of the Carthaginians. As they took for granted, that their rivals never lost fight of their e grand scheme, though the execution of it might be at a great distance, they began to reproach themselves for their indolence and sloth, which had thrown them into a kind of lethargy, especially as the Carthaginians now, with the utmost rapidity, pushed on their conquests in Spain, which might one day be turned against them. They however, at this juncture, feemed afraid of coming to an open rupture with them, LIV. POLYB. DIOD. SIC. APPIAN. CORN. NEP. EUTROP. FRONTIN. OROS. & ZONAR. ubi fup. Lucius Ampelius in lib. memor. c. 36. Aurel. Cassiod. in chron. Vide & in cum Joan. Cuspinian. comment. p. 217. edit. Bas. 1553.

"LIV. POLYB. DIOD. SIC. & Appian. ubi sup.

(N) Diodorus Siculus says, that Asarubal built two cities in Spain, and endeavoured to make a greater figure than even his father-in-law Hamiltar had done. Upon the first advice of that general's death, continues our author, he advanced with an army of fifty thousand foot, all veteran troops, six thousand horse, and two hundred elephants, to attack Orisson, whom, after a bloody contest, he intirely defeated, cutting to pieces a great part of his forces. Twelve cities, in consequence of this victory, immediately surrendered to him, and soon after all the others in Spain, that remained unsubdued. Having had such a happy run of fuccess, to crown all, he married a Spanish prince's daughter; which secured his conquests to him. The fame author adds, that, after he had commanded nine years in Spain, he was affassinated by one of his own servants; and intimates, that at, or near, the time of his death, the Carthaginian army confifted of fixty thousand foot, eight thousand horse, and two hundred elephants. As this fragment is a continuation of the preceding, some particulars in it are of a very dubious authority; and indeed our readers themselves will easily perceive this, upon their perusal of it, tho' others, that agree with the most approved authors, will, without any scruple, be admitted (40).

•

73.5 • E

on account of the apprehensions they were under of an invasion from the Gauls, who, a according to common fame, were advancing with a formidable army to the very gates of Rome. At present therefore they judged it expedient to have recourse to milder methods; and, in conformity to their plan, partly by menaces, and partly by persuasion, prevailed upon Asdrubal to conclude a new treaty with them. The articles of it were, 1. That the Carthaginians should not pass the Iberus. 2. That Saguntum, a colony of Zacynthians, and a city between the Iberus and that part of Spain subject to the Carthaginians, as well as the other Greek colonies there, should enjoy their antient rights and privileges. The Saguntines afforded the Romans something of a pretext for this unjustifiable procedure, since they implored the protection of Rome; which republic, they heard, was superior in power to that of Carthage, and kept a curb upon it. Zonaras intimates, that about this time the Carthaginians b had formed a design of attacking the Romans, but were by that people terrified into a pacific disposition. Asarubal took care not to pass beyond the limits stipulated by the treaty, though he still pushed on his conquests, and made himself master of all that part of Spain extending from the western ocean to the Iberus, within five days journey of the Pyrenees. He made it his endeavour to render himself popular amongst the reguli of Spain, by his engaging address, and affable deportment. His endeavours were not unfuccefsful; for, by his perfualive methods, he brought over more effectually those reguli to the interest of Carthage, than he could have done by torce of arms. He did not fail however exerting himself sometimes in a military way, tho' the other was, in the main, the most effectual. Having governed the Carthaginian c dominions in Spain eight years, he was treacheroufly murdered by a Gaul, whose master he had put to death. The murder was perpetrated in public; and the assaffin, being feized by the guards, and put to the torture, expressed so strong a fatisfaction in the thoughts of his having executed his revenge so successfully, that he feemed to infult all the terror of his torments. This however, notwithstanding the youth of Hannibal, occasioned no revolution in the state of affairs w.

Afdrubal fends for Hannibal.

Asdrubal, three years before his death, had written to Carthage, to defire, that Hannibal, then twenty-two years of age, might be fent to him. Hanno, the inveterate enemy of the Barchine family, opposed this with all his might, representing, in a most ill-natured speech to the senate, handed down to us by Livy, that this was d intirely improper. The substance of it was, that though Asdrubal's request seemed in itself reasonable, yet he could, by no means, give his consent to it. Asdrubal, faid he, accompanied Hamilear in his expeditions, spent the flower of his youth with him, and was abused by him; and now he would have young Hannibal in the same manner subservient to him, This ought not to be granted. Besides, added he, this young man has all the pride and thrift after arbitrary power of the Barchine family transfused into him. Instead therefore of putting him at the head of the army, where he will be, in a manner, master of all our properties, he ought to be kept under the eye of the magistrates, and the power of the laws, that he may learn obedience, and a modesty, which should teach him to look upon himself as on a level with other c men. He concluded with observing, that this spark might one day rise to a conflagration, which would occasion the ruin of the republic. However the Barchine faction prevailed, and Hannibal was fent to the army in Spain x.

Hannibal very popular amongst the eroops.

Hannibal, upon his first arrival in the camp, discovered indications of an extraordinary courage and greatness of mind. He drew upon himself the eyes of the whole army, who fansied they saw Hamilear his father survive in him. From his first appearance in the army, every one perceived, that he meditated a war against the Romans, which was considered as the effect of his father's disposition. The great resemblance he bore to Hamilear rendered him extremely agreeable to the army; but his personal good qualities endeared him still more to them. Every talent and qualification he seemed to posses, that can contribute towards constituting the great man. His patience in labour was invincible, his temperance surprising, his courage in the greatest dangers intrepid, his presence of mind in the heat of battle admirable, and his disposition equally suited to command or obey. This could not but render him the darling both of the officers and soldiers. Under Astrubal he made three campaigns, that general always employing him in enterprizes of the greatest importance, as thinking him the best qualified for the execution of them. The soldiers likewise a reposed the utmost considence in him, esteeming him superior to all the other commanders in conduct and personal bravery, though he was then but in the twenty-third year of his age. In short, after Afdrubal's death, the army immediately saluted him general, with the highest demonstrations of joy, and the sincerest attachment to his person; and the senate, as well as people of Carthage, confirmed this election, in a manner that shewed them to have been intirely at his devotion; though it must be owned, Hanno and his faction were secretly averse to him. He had no sooner taken upon him the command of the troops, being then in the twenty fixth year of his age, than he made the proper dispositions to prosecute the war with vigour, having the pleasure to find all the officers approve of the plan of operations he proposed to

As the fuffrages, both of the army and republic, concurred to raise Hannibal to Elected general the supreme command upon the death of Asdrubal, he must, of course, have been after the death extremely popular at Carthage. It is therefore probable, that about the time of his of Aldrubal. being elected general, or foon after, to heighten his credit and authority, he was advanced to the first dignity of the state, that of one of the sufferes, which was sometimes conferred upon generals. In support of this notion, Cornelius Nepos informs us, that Hannibal was chosen prætor of Cartbage, upon the conclusion of the second Punic war, twenty-two years after he had been nominated king there; which brings that event pretty near the period we are now upon 2.

Hannibal had no fooner taken upon him the command of the forces, than he put Hannibal conhimself in motion. As though Italy had been the province allotted him, and he quers the Olhad been appointed to make war upon the Romans, he turned fecretly his whole cades. views to that country, and lost no time, for fear of being prevented by death, as his father and brother-in-law had been. Though he was determined to attack Saguntum, he thought it at present more expedient not to seem to have an eye directly upon that place, but to reduce some provinces, that would facilitate the conquest of it, believing the Romans could not from thence penetrate his defigns. Accordingly he marched against the Olcades, a nation not far distant from the Iberus, and soon made himself master of Althaa, their capital; upon which all their other towns immedid ately submitted. All the plunder taken in this expedition he distributed amongst the troops, which greatly animated them, and then retired to new Carthage, where he put them into winter-quarters. Here he foon after paid the army all their arrears; by which the foldiers became in such a manner attached to him, that they were absolutely at his devotion. This first instance of success rendered his name terrible to the neighbouring nations of Spain, who were not in a state of amity with Carthage 2. THE next campaign he opened with the siege of Salmantica, and soon possessed And the Vachimself of it. Then he advanced to Arbucala, which, being a place of great strength, cai. very populous, and defended by a numerous garrison, made a vigorous resistance; but was at last forced to furrender. Soon after this event, some fugitives, who e had made their escape out of Salmantica, before it was obliged to capitulate, joining a body of the Olcades, excited the Carpetani, one of the most powerful nations in Spain, to declare against the Carthaginians. Their army amounted to an hundred thousand fighting men, with which they proposed to attack Hannibal in his return from the country of the Vaccai, which, it feems, he subdued this campaign, drawing gradually nearer the point he had in view b

Hannibal, being informed of the enemies design, and knowing himself to be He gives the much inferior to them, was determined to avoid a battle, which he had great rea-Spaniards # fon to imagine would prove fatal to him. In order to this, he moved with the utmost great overprudence and circumspection, covering himself with the Tagus in such a manner, that subdues the f the Spaniards could not come at him. At last he passed it in the dead-time of the Carpetani. night with his whole army, the enemy not entertaining the least suspicion of such an attempt. The Spaniards interpreted this as a flight, and therefore, looking upon themselves as invincible, they immediately resolved to pursue him, and, in consequence of this resolution, passed the river without any order or discipline. This was what Hannibal wanted; and, as he had foreseen it, he disposed his army in a proper manner to fall upon them when in the midst of the river. Forty elephants he posted on the bank, and ordered his horse to charge the Spanish infantry, as soon as they were

y Liv. Polyb. Aurel. Vict. & Corn. Nep. ubi sup. & Univers. hist. vol. iv. p. 690. ide & Univers. hist. ubi sup. p. 691. * Polyb. l. iii. Liv. l. xxi. sub init. 3 lidem ibid. Vide & Univer L bift. ubi fup. p. 691. b Iidem ibid.

Vol. VI. Nº 11.

10 M advanced

ra

10

'n.

Œ

1

10 4

-1! N:

Ü : 51% (1)175

int

1000

k the

701

advanced into the middle of the stream. The Carthaginian cavalry, being well 2 mounted, kept their post firm, notwithstanding the rapidity of the torrent; whereas the enemy's foot were born down by it, and besides, entering the water in a straggling disorderly manner, they were incapable of making any resistance. Great numbers of them therefore were cut to pieces in the water, without opposition, by Hannibal's horse, and others, that landed, trod to death by his elephants. Most of those who collected themselves into a body upon this disaster, and strove to gain the opposite bank, were charged by Hannibal himself, at the head of his Carthaginian phalanx, with which he had entered the water for that purpose, and, for the most part, either cut to pieces, or drowned. Hannibal, after this, laid waste the whole country of the Carpetani, who, terrified by so great a defeat, thought proper to submit to the b conqueror. Nothing now remained but Saguntum to give any obstruction to the Carthaginian arms c.

And meditates gantum.

THE Carthaginian general however thought the season was not yet come for him the fiege of Sa- to lay fiege to that city, and therefore did not, for some time, approach it, carefully avoiding every thing that might occasion a rupture with the Romans. His intention was to furnish himself with all things necessary for so important an enterprize before he entered upon it, according to the advice he had received from his brother-in-law Asarubal. In consequence of which, he pushed on his conquests, in a manner, to the very gates of Saguntum, and, by his fingular address, took care to fecure these conquests, before he gave the Romans an opportunity of declaring war e against the Carthaginians d.

The Saguntines apply to the Romans for relief.

In the mean time the Saguntines, being greatly alarmed at the continued successes of Hannibal, did not know how to avoid the impending form any otherwise than by apprifing the Romans of what had happened in Spain, and applying to them for speedy relief. They therefore dispatched deputies in all haste to Rome, to inform the senate of the great progress made by Hannibal in Spain, and to desire immediate fuccours against him. What induced them chiefly to take this step, was an attempt Hannibal made to embroil them with their neighbours the Turdetani, or, according to Appian, the Torboletæ, that, by espousing the interest of that people, he might be enabled to pick a quarrel with them. Appian intimates, that the Torboletæ made d excursions upon the Saguntine territories, where they committed great depredations. As foon as the Saguntine deputies arrived at Rome, and communicated their message to the senate, all the members of that illustrious assembly expressed a prodigious concern for their Spanish allies, and came to a resolution to send embassadors to Hannibal, to expostulate with him about his conduct, with orders, in case he did not give ear to their complaints, to proceed directly to Carthage, and infift upon that republic's withdrawing its troops from the territories of their confederates in Spain. But this resolution not being presently executed, whilst the Romans were amusing themselves with frivolous confultations, advice was brought, that Hannibal had not only passed the Iberus, but actually invested Saguntum. The senators were divided in their sentiments on this occasion: some were for coming to a vigorous resolution, and sending one of the confuls, with a powerful army, to Africa, and the other to Spain; others were for employing the whole force of the republic in driving Hannibal out of Spain; and lastly, others gave it as their opinion, that nothing should be undertaken against Carthage, till all pacific methods had been tried, and no redress could be had but by force of arms. This motion, being the most safe, as well as rational and equitable, prevailed; and accordingly P. Valerius Flaccus and Q. Babius Tampbilus were dispatched with all possible expedition to the Carthaginian camp before Sa-

Hannibal bepeges Siguntum.

In the mean time Hannibal pushed on the siege of Saguntum, promising himself f great advantages from the reduction of that place. He was convinced, that this would enable him to put his favourite scheme in execution, and even accomplish it; that he should deprive the Remans of all means of carrying the war into Spain; that this new conquest would serve as a barrier to the old ones; that no enemy would be left behind him, a circumstance which would render him much more secure and unmolested; that he should there find treasure sufficient to defray the expence of his projected war with the Romans; that the plunder of the city would inspire his foldiers with greater ardour, and make them follow him with the utmost alacrity;

e lidem ib'd. d lidem ibid. * LIV. ubi sup. Appean, in Iberic. Aurel. Vict. in Hannib. 42.

. .5 3

id m·t ad. ii. ix 100 100 r.

10 _ 25 1 1;2 uld x 7 11 DC 1 X ... 3

1.7

2.4

a and that, lastly, thereby he should win the people of Carthage over to his interest. These considerations had such an effect upon him, that he was present at all the works, conducted every particular measure in the siege, and exposed himself to the greatest dangers, as much as the meanest soldier. With the commencement of this siege we shall conclude this section and volume, and begin our next with an account of the reduction of Saguntum, which was the immediate cause of the second Punic war f.

f Liv. & Polyb. ubi sup. OROS. ubi sup. c. 14. EUTROP. l. iii. c. 7.

The end of the fixth volume.

ERRATA.

E. R. R. A. T. A.

Page 675. 1. 33. for was equal, read was equally. p. 685. 1. 2. for shemain, r. shemaim. p. 687. 1. 9. for Dis majorum gentium. p. 717. 1. 14. for siland Ægssla, r. islands Ægssla. p. 717. 1. 1. 26. for nine different mations, r. many nations there. p. 717. 1. 34, 35. for expossulate with Hannibal upon his taking of Saguntum, r. demand Hannibal of the Cartbuginiant, for taking Saguntum. p. 717. 1. 40. for at Ticinum, now called Pavis, r. near the Ticinus, now called the Tosino. p. 718. 1. 41. for demolish, r. abandon. p. 723. 1. 13. for Carthage, r. Tyre. p. 724. 1. 24. for through, r. notwithstanding. p. 724. 1. 43. for Cyaxeres. p. 727. 1. 44. expunge that is to the southward of it. p. 732. 1. 41. expunge some. p. 776. 1. 47. in the beginning of the adculum of the mote (D), for both these donations were, r. the cell or apartment, in which these donations were deposited, was. And in 1. 49. ibid. for done, r. make. And in 1. 54, 55. ibid. for Phanias, Eressus, and Theopompus, r. Phanias Eressus, and Theopompus. p. 104. 1. 22. for their march, r. his march. And for harass them, r. harass him. p. 836. for consul, r. consuls, p. 719. remove the letter (B) from the word advantage, l. 8, to the word Usber, l. 12. p. 854.01. 2. note (R), expunge the whole last period, beginning at the words, We must, &c.

AN

TOTHE

SIXTH VOLUME.

The Numbers direct to the Page, the small Letters to the Line of the Page, and the great Letters to the Notes.

Acius St. the church of, at Constantinople, 268, c. Aaron martyred in Devonshire, 216, d.

and Abaddires at Carthage, whence worflupped, 693, a, b.

Abdelmelek the Saracen makes peace with Justinian

II. 546, f. & feq.

Abgarus's embaffy to Trajan, 17, d. Reception of him, 18, e. Submittion to Severus, 114, 2. Ablavivus's treachery to Sopater, 274, sub not. Murdered by the soldiers, 275, 2.

, a king of the Thervingi, heads them towards Thrace, 380, d. Outwits and surprises the Romans, 381, b, c.

put to death for treason, 530, a.

Abraham Halim deseated by the Romans, 599, d, e. Abundantius the raiser of Eutropius, 435, a, b. Ungratefully requited by him, 436, a. Banished, ibid. b, c.

Abydos, the oracle of, in Egypt, 305, e.

Abydus taken by the Turks. 642, c.
Abyla, where fituate, 865, (L).
Aca, Aco, a famed port in Phanice, 659, e, (C).
Acacius ient against the Persians, 532, d. Abandoned by the army, ibid. e.

Achaia freed from the Goths, 180, c: New ravaged by them, 184, d. Betrayed to, and ravaged by, Alaric, 433, d.

Achambylus subdued by Trajan, 22, b.

Achillaus's revoit and defeat, 192, a.

Achillaus revolts in Egypt, 209, d. Defeated by Dioclesian, 213, b, c.

Acholius's writings and character, 148, (Q). Acholla, where lituate, 669, e.

Acra, Hippo, whence so called, 667, f. The meaning of that word, 835, (E).

Acradian taken by Himilto, 763, f, & feq. Acris taken and plundered, 808, d, (Z). Adda, Addis, its situation, 666, (A).

Ademystes delivered up to the Romans, 18, f. Adherbal defeats the Romans at ica, 846, d, e.

Adiabene subdued by Trajan, 18, f. Reduced by Severus, 110, c, d.

Vol. VI. Nº 11.

Adranum taken by the Romans, 817, 2. - battle of, 777, c, d. Adria, where situate, 30, a.

Adria, where ituate, 30, 2.

Adrian adopted by Trajan, 9, d, &c 25, e, f. Made quæstor, 11, c. Funeral honours to Sura, 13, 2.

Demoisses Trajan's bridge, 14, d. Gallantry against the Dacians, ibid. f, & seq. Prætorship and games, 17, b. Sent into Pannonia, ibid. f, & seq. Made archon of Athens, 20, b. Governor feq. Made archon of Athens, 20, 0. Governo. of Syria, 25, 2. Proclaims himself emperor at Antioch, ibid. b. Whether really adopted by Trajan, ibid. f, & seq. His extract and education, Trajan, ibid. f, & feq. His extract and education, 30, & feq. Prodigious memory, ibid. e. Learning, 31, 2. Clemency, liberality, &c. ibid. & feq. Mild government, 32, & feq. Letter to the fenate, 33, b. Modest entry into Rome, ibid. f, & feq. Generous remittances, 34, 2, b. Success against the Scythians, ibid. c, d. Severity to some worthies, ibid. e, f. Progress through the empire, 35, & feq. Narrow escape in Spain, ibid. e. Return to Rome, ibid. f. To Athens, ibid. & feq. Into the east, 36, 2, b. To Africa, ibid. d. Syria and Egypt, 37, 2, b. Observations on that country, ibid. d, e. Unnatural love to Antinous, 38, b, c. Exasperates the Jews, ibid. f. Severity against them, ibid. & feq. Stay and munisicence at Athens, 42, c. Return to Rome, ibid. f, & feq. at Athens, 42, c. Return to Rome, ibid. f, & feq. Sickness, 43, c. Names Verus his fuccessor, ibid.
d, e. Cruelties, 44, b, c. Adopts Antoninus, 45,
a. Suffers intolerable pains, ibid. c, d, e. Des at Baia, 46, a. His verses to his soul, ibid. (B). The year of his death, ibid. (C). Funeral, buildings, &c. ibid. & seq. Huge mausoleum, 47, b. Character, laws, &c. ibid. & seq. Writings, 48, (D). Temple built by Antoninus, 57, f.

banished for not relieving Syracuse, 573, e.

Adrianople blocked up by the Goths, 381, e. The battle of, 383, e, & seq. Betrayed to the Bulgarians, 578, d. Besseed by the Scythians, 612, pass.

Preserved by a stratagem, 613. Taken by the Turks, 645, e. Made the metropolis of their empire, ibid. f.

Adrumetum described, 668, d, e. Whence so called, ibid. f. Besieged by the Carthaginians, 800, 2, &c. Advasmanes deteated by the Romans, 533, e.

Adventus, an illiterate competitor of Macrinus, 129,

Promoted by him, ibid. c. Made prince of the senate, 132, b. Adultery, some severe laws against, 131, e. Revived by Aurelian, 194, b. Ægidius, the Gaul, marches against Ricimer, 507, b. Success against the Viligaths, bid. c, d. Murdered, Ægimurus, illand, described, 672, sub not. (8). Repps, all the temples of, demotished, 417, past. Ægyptians massacred by the Jews, 23, d. Acknow-ledge Macrianus, 179, a. Punished by Dioclesian, 213, b. Converted under Theodosius, 417, c, d. Subdued by Haumar, 543, e, f. Ælia Capitolina, Jerusalem so named by Adrian, 41, b, c. Ælian's writings and character, 51, sub not. Ælianus Papyrius chosen consul, $8, e. - L. his revolt and defeat, 482, f. Ælius Serenian. one of Alexander's counsellors, 138, e. His writings, &c. 149, sub not. Ælius marries Severus's daughter, 108, c. governor of Constantinople's life attempted by Coryachus, 473. His rise and character, 478, b. Sides with the usurper John, 479, a, b. Submits to Placidia, 480, a. Success against the Vandals, ibid. b, &c. Æmilia and two other vestals put to death, 27, 2. Æmilianus proscribed by the senate, 108, f. Defeated and put to death, 109, b. fuccess against the barbarians, 171, c. Proclaimed emperor, ibid. c, d. His extract, rise, &c. Where killed, ibid. & feq. a. With the name of Alexander, ibid. b. Defeated and strangled, ibid. f. Æmilius Parthenianus's writings and character, 84. fub not. Junctus, consul, banished by Commodus, 88, c. Æmona abandoned to Maximin, 178, d. fituated, ibid. e. Æonia, the mother of Aufonius, her extract, 401, Æsculapius deaf to the prayers of Caracalla, 126, b. His temple at Carthage, 661, c. Burnt, 691, c. Ethiopia spreads a dreauful plague over the empire, Embaffy to Constantine, 264, f. 171, b. Ethusa, island, where situate, 672, sub not. 4.

Ethusa's treachery to Boniface, 480, e, f. Success against the Franks, 481, f. Treachery to Falix, ibid. e. To Placidia discovered, ibid. & seq. Defeated by the Vandals, 482, c, d. Forgiven and raised by Placidia, ibid. e, f. Success against the Burgundi, 483, b, c. Rejects the complaints of the Britains, 489, a. Raises numerous forces against Assila, 495, a, b. Repulses him at the battle of Chalons, ibid. & seq. Alarmed at entering Italy, 496, c. Undermined by Heraclius, 496, e, & seq. Murdered by Valentinian, 499, b.

Irene's favourite, prevents her marriage with Charles of France, 560, b. Sent against the Saracens, 569, f. Defeated, 570, a. Æina mount visited by Adrian, 36, b. Ætolia scized by Michael Angelus, 629, c. Afer Septim. Sever. put to death by Caracalla, 124, d. Africa honoured hy Adrian, 36, c, d. Revolts against Maximin, 153, b. Under Celfus, 182, f. Destroyed by Maxentins, 241, c, d. Relieved by Constant, ibid. & feq. Submits to Constanting, 285, e. Sadly hampered by the Moors, 349, a. Revolts to Arcadins, 438, f. Returns to Honorius, 440, e. Kept locked up by Heraclian, 461, d, 440, c. Rept locked up by Intraction, 461, d, 463, c. Over-run by the barbarians, 482, d, e. Possessens, 544, c, d. Rivaged by them, 546, a.

—— Propria described, 664, &t seq.

African clergy privileged by Constantine, 251, d, f.

Africans, their bad discipline, 743, (H). Abandoned by the Carthaginians, 767, c, d. Revolt and march against Carthage, 769, b, c. Dispersed for want of a leader, ibid. d. Treachery to their allies, 811, b. Africanus cruelly used by Constantine, 294, c. Agar, where fited, 669, c. Agathocles chosen general of the Syracusians, 788, f. Stratagem against Gela, 789, b, c. Breaks his oath with the Syracusians, ibid. d, e. Makes peace with Carthage, 790, a. Breaks it, and plunders them, ibid. & feq. Treachery to the Messanians, 791. a. Retaliates the Carthaginians cruelty, ibid.

b, c. Defeated by them, ibid. & feq. Shut up in Syracuse, 792, d, e. Leaves it, and sails for Afric, 793, pass. Lands, and burns his fleet, 794, c, d.
Takes and races two cities, 795, d, e, f. Ravages Africa, 796, c, f. Defeats the Carthaginians, 797, c, d. Marrowly escapes a revolt, 803. Treachery to Ophellas, 805, & seq. Proclaimed king of Africa, 807, d. Returns into Sicily, 808, b, (Y). Regains several cities, ibid. c, d. Returns into Afric, 810, e, f. His speech to his army, ibid. (B). Defeated by the Carthaginians. 811, b. A dreadful uproar in his camp, ibid. e, &c feq. Returns into Sicily, 812, b. His African troops make peace with Carthage, ibid. c, d. Which he ratifies, 813, b. Invades part of Italy, ibid. e. Dies, ibid. d. Agelmond chosen king of the Jepida, 391, c.
Agentes at court reduced by Julian, 325, c.
Agilo succeeds the brave Ursainus, 308, a. against the Persians, 314, c. Promoted by Julian, 324, f. Forsakes Procopius, 368, b. Aginacius unjustly put to death, 361, c. Agnes St. the church of, built by Confiamemo, 248, f. Agricola Calpurn. fent against the Britons, 62, c. Agrigensine Pheaces, what, 734, (B).
Agrigensines success against the Carthaginians, 734, a, b. Humanity to the fugitive Selinuntines, 742.

Preparations against Hammbal, 746, b, c. Resorreparations against Hammons, 740, b, c. Resolute defence against him, 747, pass. Sad infatuation, ibid. d, e. And mutiny, ibid. f. Forsaken by their mercenaries, 748, d. Distinal catastrophe, ibid. & feq. The survivors take some cities in Sicily, 801, & feq. Ally with Carthage, 824, d, e. Besseged by the Romans, 829, a, b, &c. Abandoned so them ibid f Abandoned to them, ibid. f. Agrigentum destroyed by Carthale, 843, b. Agrippa, a worthless flave, promoted, 132. Agrippinus Fabius put to death by Heliogabalus, Agyris the tyrant affilts Dionysius, 770, c. Ajonus heads the Lombards into Germany, 391, e. Air worshipped by the Carebaginians, 692, a. Alabicus put to death for treason, 465, c, d. Alacafeus's noble stratagem, 613, a, b. Aladin's family and empire, 629, a. diamondons's impotent threats against the Romans, 475, a. Commands the Saracens against them, 525, a. Repulsed in Syria, ibid. b, c. Allans, where situate, 379, c. Ally with the Hunns, ibid. d. Enter Gaul, 462, b. Settle in Spain, ibid. d, e, &t seq. Deseated by Wallia, 472, c. Submit to Gondaric, ibid. Settle upon the Loire, Alaric a Frank general under Theodofini, 424, a.
Makes dreadful havock in Spria, 433, c, d, e. Narrowly escapes, 435, d, e. Promoted by Ar-ending, ibid. e, f. Invades the Roman territories, 447, f. His extract and character, 448, a, b. First retirement, ibid. e. Second invation, 449, b, c. Ravages Early, ibid. d. Defeated, 45e, c, d. Makes peace, and breaks it, ibid. e, f. Exorbitant demands on Edmorins, 455, e, f. Strengthment by the berkering, 458, a. Blocker of Romands ened by the barbarians, 4,8, a. Blocks up Rome, ibid. b. Raifes the fiege on exorbitant terms, ibid. d. Retires into Hetrseria, ibid. e. Second siege of Rome, 459, f, & seq. Sends more moderate terms to the emperor, 460, e, f, & feq. acrate terms to the emperor, 460, e, f, &t feq. And to the city of Rome, 461, a, b. Proclaims Attalus through Italy, 462, a. Depofes him, and confirms Honorius, 463, d, e. Breaks off with him, ibid. &t feq. Reftores and depofes Attalus, 464, a. Takes the city of Rome, ibid. b, c. His death, 465, b. Buried in the bottom of a river, ibid. c. ibid. c.

Alba, the birth-place of Persinax, 96, f. Beantified by him, 97, c.

Albanians subdued by Trajan, 18, c. Resuse to come to Adrian, 37, b.

- foldiers, whence so called, 133, d. Revolt to Heliogabalus, ibid. & feq. Murder the two Maximins, 159, C.

Albanus Verulam. martyred in Britain, 216, C. Albia Dominica married to Valens, 366, c. Delivered of Valentinian IL 369, c.

Albinus Clodius opposes Cassius, 76, a. Chosen conful, 79, b. Success in the north, 87, c. Against the Frisians, 90, 2. Made governor of Britain, 92, d. His extract and character, 101, f, & seq. Hatred against monarchy, 102, b. Excessive gluttony, &c. ibid. c, d. How characterized by M. Aurelius, ibid. (L). Tampered by Severus, 105, c. Created Gafar, 108, a. Declares himfelf em peror, 111, e. Defeated, 112, b. A second time near Trewax, 113, e, f. His death, ibid. & seq. Alcan's bravery at the siege of Mantzirchierta, 600, Aleimus's writings and character, 316, (G). Aldhemus consulted about Confiansine's birth, 227, Alemani, their first ravages in the empire, 125, f.

Where situated, ibid. & seq. Descated by Galliemus, 173, d. By Conflantins, 215, c. Make peace with him, 290, d, e.

Aleria taken by Scipie, 833, d, (Q).

Alexander Severus proclaimed emperor, 137, 2. His extract and excellent education, ibid. c. Respect for his mother, ibid. c. And for the christians, ibid & feq. Reforms the flate, 139, a. Marries Sulpitia, ibid. b. Mild usage of Camillus, ibid. f, & seq. Expedition into Germany, 140, b, c. Friendship to Cassius, ibid. c, d. Severity to Turinus, 141, a, b, c. Retires into Campania, ibid. e. Marches against Artacernes, ibid. & feq. Treatment of his embassadors, 142, a. Noble speech to the revolted legion, ibid. c, d. Admirable discipline, ibid. f, & seq. Various accounts of that expedition, 143, e, f. Victory over the Perfians, 144, pass. Speech to the senate, ibid. b, c. Triumph, ibid. s. Hastens against the Germans, 145, b. Murdered there, 146, b. His character, ibid. pass. Excellent virtues, ibid. & seq. Public works, 148, a, b. Learning, ibid. c, d. Cotemporary authors, ibid. (Q).

a noted impedior, 81, (N). Comically described by Lucian, 82, sub not.

Hermogenes's Writings and character, $3, fub

- Julius's bravery and death, 110, e, f. revolts against Manentins, 238, b. Deseated and killed, 241, b.

- a cruel governor of Antioch, 329, f.

- bishop of Ferusalem, 168, d.

the brother of Leo, made regent of the empire, $77, a. His cruelty and debauchery, ibid. Affront to the king of Bulgaria, ibid. f. Death, 578, a.

books, c.c. 115, c. Vinted by Caracalla, 126,

Alexandria rebuilt by Adrian, 37, e. Enriched by M. Aurelius, 79, d. Ruined by Caracalla, 127, d. In a dreadful condition under Macrianus, 179, a, b. Plundered by the Romans, 213, b, c. Laid under water, 328, b.

Alexandria, the museum of, described, 37, f.

Alexandrians ingratitude to Adrian, 37, e, f, & seq. Massacred for lampooning of Caracalla, 127, c, d. Submit to Emilianus, 181, a.

Alexius patriarch's base complaisance to Zoe, 595,

- Comnenus. Vide fub Comnenus, 607, & feq. II. governed by his wicked mother, 620, e. By Andronious, 621, pass. Strangled by him, ibid. f, & seq.

- Angelus revolts against his brother Isaac, f. Cruelty to him, 629, a. Deseat and 620, f.

flight, ibid. & feq.

president under Alexius II. deseated, 621, His wretched character, ibid. b, c, d.

the fon of Ifaac, stirs up the western princes in his favour, 625, b, c, d. His success against Angelus, ibid. & seq. Crowned with his father, 626, c. Murdered, 627, 2.

- stirs up the Turks against Lascaris, 628, f, & seq. Defeated by him, 629, c. Imprisonment, and death, ibid. d.

Seizes on Constantinople, ibid. c, d.

Alexon discovers and frustrates a piece of Roman treachery, 845, e, f.

Alexus born, 132, e. Adopted by Heliogabalus, 137, a. Takes the name of Alexander Severus, ibid. &c. Hated and degraded by that tyrant, ibid. b. Saved by the foldiers, ibid. d. And proclaimed emperor, ibid. & feq. The rest fee under Aleemperor, ibid. & feq. The xander Severus, 138, & feq.

Alford, father, confuted, 227, e.

Allectus's treachery to Carnusius, 211, c. Defeat and death, 212, d, e.

Alface taken by the Burgundi, 468, c. Alusius repulsed before Thessalonica, 537, b.

Alypius unjustly banished, 357, b.

vicar of Britain, banished by Valens, 374, f. Amandus revolts in Gaul, 207, c. Defeated at sea, 258, d. Amantius conspires against Justin, 523, a. Executed,

Ambrofe St. his rife and first acquaintance with Prob. Noble speech to the usurper Maximus, 400, c. To Theodofus, 414, e, f. Baptizes Valentinian, 419, e. Panegyric upon that prince, 420, e, f. Letter to Eugenius, 421, c. Reproof of Theodosius's cruelty to the Thessalinicans, 427, d, e. Letters to queen Frieigil, 438, a. Death, 439, 2. Ambustus's conspiracy, 601, s, & seq. Bravery, 602, c. ď.

Amelius's writings and character, 196, & seq. sub not.

Amida fortified by Constantius, 277, a. Besieged by Sapor, 306, f, & feq. Dreadful catastrophe, 307, b, c. Restored by the Nissisians, 343, d. Taken by the Persians, 520, c, d. Restored to the Romans, ibid. e, f.

miden's brave defence against the Persums, 520, c. Put to the sword, ibid. d.

Amiens repeopled by the Franks, 213, b. Ammianus Marcellinus goes with Urinicus to Rame, 292, 2, d. To the east, 306, e. Joins him at Misshene, 307, e. Character of Julian, 335, & seq. A chasse in his history, 378, e. Writings and character, 385, (K.).

Amorium taken by the Saraceus, 545, c. Retaken from them, ibid. d. Why engraven upon their fhields, 169, e. Betrayed and razed, 170, a. dimerat's faccels in Europe, 645, e, f. Severity to his fon, ibid. & feq.

II. repulsed before Confiantinople, 643, 2, b. Frequently defeated by John Hummades, ibid. c. d.

Signal victory over him, ibid. e, f. Haughty demands on the emperor, ibid. & feq. Death, Anax the father of the Anakims, 673, a, (A). Whence so called, ibid.

Anactes or Dioscuri at Carthage, who, 694, c, 695, a. (Z).

Anastasia, daughter to Constantius, 226, e. Married to Bassianus, 227, a. Murdered by the soldiers,

- daughter of Valens, 385, d. - wite of Tiberius, created Augusta, 533, c.

Affronted by her son's ministers, 547, e.

Anastasius crowned emperor, 517, c. His rise and extract, ibid. & seq. Excellent beginning, 518, pass. Insulted on account of his new tax, 519, h. Acknowledges Theodoric in Italy, ibid. e. scapes being massacred, ibid. e, f. Invaded by the Persians, 520, c, d, e. Makes a truce with them, 521, a. His long wall described, ibid. b, c. Compliments to Clovis, ibid. d, e. Persecutes the orthodox, ibid. & seq. Treachery to Vitalianus, 522, b, c. Death and character, ib. d, e.

- patriarch of Antioch, massacred by the Jews, 538, d.

· Phocas's minister, conspires against him, 538, e. Put to death, ibid. f.

- the son of Thomas, put to death, 566, b.

- Artemius proclaimed emperor, 550, c. His excellent character, ibid. Fortifies himself against the Saracens, ibid. d. Banished by Theodosius, ibid. Resumes his claim, 551, f, & seq. Put to death, 552.

Anatolius killed by the Persians, 334, d. Ancona, the port of, made by Trajan, 22, 2.

Andragathius, the supposed murderer of Gratian, 393, e, & seq. Sent to oppose Theodosius, 412, Drowns himself, 415, f.

Androclides's writings and character, 197, fub not. Andromachus's brave answer to the Carthaginians threats, 777, b.

Andronicus excommunicated and degraded, 466, a. Ducas betrayed by Samonas, 576, a. Flees to the Saracens, ibid. c. Dies, ibid. d.

the fon of Ducas, lett under guardianship, 603, f. Treachery to Diog. Romanus, 605,e.

Revolts against Alexius II. 620, f. Declared his guardian, 621, c. And protector, ibid. d. Horrid butcheries and impiety, ibid. f, & seq. Defeated by William king of Sicily, 622, b, c. His dreadful end, ibid. e.

- Paleologus. Vide fub Paleologus, 608, & feq. Anefria put to death by Simplicius, 361, c. Anglo-Saxons come into England, 400, d.

Anicetus, governor of Rome, killed, 28t, e.

Ann, princeis, conspires against her brother, 617, Forgiven, ibid.

Aima, empreis, initigated against Cantacusenus, 643, a, b. Over-reached by his enemies, 644, a, b. Anna Perenna worshipped at Carthage, 692, b.

Amian family, an account of, 60, & leq. Converted to christianity, 415, di Annibalinus the fon of Constantius, 226. e. Made king of Pontus, ibid. & 266, 2. Murdered by the soldiers, 275, 2.

Annona prafectus, his office, 356, e.

Antandras lest governor of Syracuse, 793, c. His inditeretion, ibid. & feq. Antaradus, whence called Constantia, 277, f.

Anterus, a tool of Commodus, murdered, 88, c. Anthemisia subdued by Trajan, 21, b.

Anthemius's rife and confuship, 452, a. Excellent government, 466, a. 458, f. Extract and character, 459, a, b. Refigns to Pulcheria, 470, c. Success against the Offrogoths, 506, f. Against the Hunns, 508, c. Rassed to the empire by Ricimer, ibid. & seq. His reception at Rome, ibid. c. Put to death by Ricimer, 511, c.

Antinous's death, an account of, 38, b, c.

Antioch damaged by an earthquake, 21, c. By fire, 58, f. Rebuilt by Antoninus, 59, a. Punished for fiding with Cassius, 79, c. Forgiven, ibid. d. Distranchised and restored by Severus, 110, b. Taken and plundered by Sapor, 174, b. Retaken by Valerian, ibid. d. Plundered and razed by Sapor, 176, f, & seq. Relieved by Constantine under a famine, 264, e. Its famed port built, 277, e, f. Depopulated by famine, 327, c. Raifes a sediction, 408, b, c. Severe punishment, ib. les a ledition, 408, b, c. Severe punishment, ib. & seq. Dreadul condition, 409, & seq. Pardoned by Theodosius, 411, e, f. Gratitude to Endocia, 485, a, b. Ruined by an earthquake, 506, a. Under Justin, 523, s. Destroyed by the Persisans, 526, f. By an earthquake, 535, a. Retaken by Burzas, 584. By the cruisators, 615, e.

the noble portico of, built by Rufinus, 432, e. f. Antiochus the sophist, his character, &c. 83, subnot.

- betrays Achain to Alaric, 433, e. - the governor of Theodofius II. 459, d, e. Degraded, ibid. & seq.

Ansipater, Severus's secretary, faved, 120, e. the foohist's writings and character, 120, (N). Antoninus, why that name effected by the Romans, 57, a, b.

- Arrius's speech to Nero, 2, f, & seq. - Pius's first consulship, 34, f. Adopted by Adrian, 15. His love for him, 35, paff. Speech to the senate, 46, b. Why surnamed Pins, ibid. & 54, & feq. His extract, 49, & feq. Second confulhip, 52, b. Issue, 53, a. Excellent character, issue for May and when adopted by Adrian, 54, b, c. Made high pontiss, 55, a. His Meeknels and generolity, &c. 55, & leq. learned men, 56, a, b. Buildings, ibid. c, d. Highly esteemed by all nations, ibid. & seq. Letters in favour of the christians, 58, e. Sickness and death, 59, b, c. Funeral obsequies, ibid. & seq.

the fon of Petronius, put to death, 91, e. the fon of Severus. See Caracalla, 104, &c.

ſcq.

ftirs up the Persians against Constantius, 306, Ь.

Anutius descated, 109, e.

orders in favour of the christians, 251, c,

Anyfous drives the Moors out of Pentapalis, 467, c. Apames taken by the Scythians, 174, c. Plundered by Costrhoes, 527, b. Taken and burnt by him, 532, d. By Costrhoes Ik 539, c.

Aper murders Numerianus, 205, b. Discovered and taken, ibid. c. Killed by Dioclesian, 206, d. Apes worshipped by some Africans, 709, (A).

Apocancus's cruelty to Cantacusenus's mother, 644, a, b.

Apochapsus seizes on Crete, 566, b.c. Apodemus an informer burnt alive, 325, a. Apollinares, the two, banished and murdered, 291, f. Apollinarians suppressed by Theodosius, 415, b. By Arcadius, 439, C.

Apollodorus's famous bridge, 14, c. Other great works, 26, c, d. Mortified by Adrian, 36, e. Banished and put to death, ibid. & seq.

Apollonius Tyaneus persuades Nerva to assume the purple, 2, b.

- the stoic's haughty behaviour to Antoninus, 54, a, b.

Dyscoles's writings and character, 84, sub

Apollo's temple at Rome burnt, 328, b. His temple and golden statue at Carshage, 662, d.

Apostate christians deprived from making a will, 395, f, 397, e. Disfranchifed by Theodojius, 418, c. Apostles church at Constantinople described, 268, Appian's writings and character, 59, (E).

Appius

Appius Claudius. Vide Claudius, 828, & seq. Apronianus put to death by Severus, 117, c.

Apsimar revoits against Justinian. See sub Tiberius, Appimas's writings and character, 168, (X). Apuleius the philosopher's writings and character, 82. lub not.

Aquicum, a city in New Pannonia, 211, 2. Aquilaria in Tunes, where fituate, 667, a.

1:

7

Aquileis belieged by Maximin, 158, f. Taken by Conflantine, 245, f. Stout defence against Julian, 313, f. Taken by Maxentius, 412, f. Destroyed Ly Attila, 496, e, f.

Aguileian womens fignal bravery and reward, 159, b. Aquilia Severa, a veltal, forced to marry Heliogabalus, 135, a.

Aquilius fent to murder Severus, 105, c. Sides with him, ibid. d.

Aquitania iccond and third given to Vallia, 472. Their situation, ibid. f.

Aquitans invaded by the Vandals, 453, f. Aquiulphus revolts from Theodoric, 503. d.

Arabia Petrea invaded by Paima, 16, 2.

Felix invaded by Trajan, 22, b, c. By Severus, 110, c,d. Divided by Valens, 372, d. Subdued by the Saracens, 544, d.

Endemon, why so called, 22, c. Arabians sharply reproved by Alexander, 146, d. Aradia Conflantia, where fited, 265, d.

Aradus conquered by the Saracens, 544, d.

Arator murdered by the Germans, 355, b.
Aratus revolts to the Romans, 523, c. His reception from Narfes, 524, f.

Arbazacius countenances the plundering of the I/aurians, 451, e, f.

Arbela taken by Trajan, 20, d.

Arbetio's defeat in Germany, 294, d. Treachery to Silvanus, ibid. & feq. Singular arrogance, 325, 2. Plundered by Procopius, 367, f. Revenge on him, 368, a.

Arbogasses sent to Theodosius's assistance, 396, b. To invest Maximus, 413, b. To put Victor to death, ibid. e. Murders Valentinian, 419, f, & seq. Signal arrogance to him, 420, a, b. Wars against nal arrogance to him, 420, a, b. Wars against the Franks, 423. Defeated by Theodosius, 424, pass Kills himself, 425, b.

Arbon, where ituate, 387, d.

Arbora, a cruel cunuch of Constantine, 293, a. the bridge of, broken by Julian, 331, d.

Arboreus, the father of Ausonius, his extract, 401, (L).

Arcadia born to Arcadius, 447, e. Her character, buildings, &c. 455, a, b. Death, 483, e. Arcadius, the fon of Theodofius, born, 390, e. Proclaimed emperor, 402, b. Softens the penalties against the marriages of first cousins, 404, d. Chofen consul, 406, d. Clemency to the Arians, fen consul, 406, d. Clemency to the Arians, 419, d. Has the east affigned to him, 426, c. Under the care of Rusinus, 430, f. Proves a weak prince, 432, b. Marries Eudoxia, ibid. f. Swayed by the villain Eutropius, 435, c. Against Stilicho, 336, a, b. Law against the asyla of churches, 337, d. Journey to Ancyra, 338, b. Acknowledged in Afric, ibid. e, f. Deposes Eutropius, 443, d, e. Laws against idolatry, 444, e, f. Timorous compliance to Gainas, 445, c, d. Intermorous compliance to Gainas, 445, c, d. Interview with him, ibid. f. Severity to the Goths, view with him, thid. t. Severny to the 446, d, e, f. Presented with the head of Gainas, 447, d. His column and statue reared, 449, f, & fee. Death and issue, 454, f, & seq. The fabufeq. Death and issue, 454, f, & seq. lous story of his last will, 459, b, c, d. Arcagautes in Sarmatia, who, 265, b.

Archagathus commands under Agathotles, 797, a, b. Success in Afric, 808, & seq. Distressed by the Success in Afric, 808, & seq. Carthaginians, 810, past. Murdered by his troops, Archylus's bravery rewarded by Dionysius, 758, c. Ardaburius's success against the Persians, 474, c, d, 475, c, d. Sent into the west against John, 479, Vol. VI. No 11. b, c. Shipwrecked and taken by him, ibid. d. Outwits and takes him, ibid. e. Becomes suspected to Leo, 510, d, e. Put to death, ibid. f.

Ardshir. Vide Artaxer, 405, a. Argentaria, where fited, 387, b.

- the battle of, ibid. Argos burnt by the Hernli, 184, d.

Argos burnt by the Hernis, 184, d.

Ariadne married to Zeno, 510, a. Suspected of incontinence, &c. 517, b, c. Married to Anastasius, ibid. c. Insulted with him, 519, b.

Arians flattery to Jovian, 343, f. Repulsed, 344,
a. Suppressed by Theodosus, 395, c, d, 396, a.

Commit fresh outrages, 414, c. Driven out of the cities, 419, d, e. Suppressed by Justin, 523,

Arintheus defeats the Persuans, 294, d. Promotes Bravery against Valentinian's election, 346, c. Hipporechius, 367, c. Sent against Sapor, 373, d. Ariobundus's valour against the Persuans, 475, b. Defeated by Cabades, 520, d, e.

Ariogeses made king of the Quadi, 63, b. Defeated and taken, ibid. c.

Arifius defeated in Thrace, 520, a.

Aristenetus's writings and character, 94, (I). Destroyed by an earthquake, 304, d.

Ariflides prefers an apology in favour of the christians, 48, e.

the fophist's interview with M. Aureliui, 79, d. His writings, &c. 83, fub not.

Arijiceles's writings and character, 83, fub not.

Aristophanes cruelly used by Catena, 288, f. By Modestus, 305, 2.

Arifiotle's account of the Carthaginian government, 674, paff. Defects obierved by him, 680, & feq. & (M).

Arius Antoninus his excellent character, 52, a. Unjust death, 91, c.

the heretic, binished, 260, e. Received by the council of ferusalem, 265, e. His death, 266, c.

Arles belieged by Geronicius, 466, a. By Conflan-tius, ibid. c. Surrendered, 467, a, b. Relieved by Egidius, 507, a.

- the council of. Vide sub Council, 254, b. Armenia subjected to the Romans, 17. & seq. Alalowed to chuse a king, 23, d. War with the lowed to chuse a king, 33, d. War with the Parthians, 63, d. Reduced by the Romans, 65, a. Restored by Macrinus, 131, d. Subdued by the Persians, 214, a.

Major's wars against Maximin in defence of christianity, 250, d. Revolts, 276, a. The end of that kingdom, 487, b. Subdued by the Saracens, 527, c, d. Betrayed to them, 548, d.

Armenian legions refuse to swear to Irene, 558, a, & e. Severely punished, ibid. f.

Armorici, who, 462, c. Short-lived revolt, ibid. d. Arnagifelus deteated and killed by Astila, 489, b. Arrian writes Trajan's hittory, 18, d. His books loft, 19, b, c. An account of his works, 50, sub governor of Cappadocia, suppresses the Mas-fagetes, 41, c. Instructions and order of battle, ibid. f. March round the Euxine sea, 42, 2, b.

Whether the same with the historism, 90, sub-not. His writings and character, 164, (W). Arsaces summoned by fulian, 329, c. Receives an impious message from him, 331, b. Aban-doned by the Romans, 342, a. Treacherously murdered by Sapor, 372, e, f.

- yields his kingdom to the Persians, 487, b.

Arsacius disgraced, 460, c.

Artabanes narrowly escapes Caracalla's cruelty, 127, e, f, & seq. Declares war against Macrinus, 131,

- made governor of Armenia, 373, a. Betrays the Persians, ibid. b.

Artabanus's success against the Romans, 532, b, c, d. Artaxata taken by Priscus, 64, f.

Artaxer succeeds Sapor in Persia, 404, f. Artaxerxes restores the Persian empire, 129, e, f. Invades the Roman territories, 141, e. Contempt of Alexander's message, ibid. e, f. Proud embassy to him, 142, a. Prodigious army, 143, d, e. Total deseat, 144, a, b, c. Artemidorus's writings and character, 84, fub not, general of the Syracusians, 816, e.

Artemius proclaimed emperor. Vide Anastusius, 515, & seq. Aruspices forbid by Constantine, 256, b. Arzacene yielded to the Romans, 215, 2, b, c. Asan's ill success in Media, 599, d. Asclepas banished by Consumere, 265, f. Asclepiadotus lands in Britain, and burns his ships, 212, d. Defeats the rebels there, ibid. d, e. Ascolus, bishop, baptizes Theodosius, 393, d. Ashrubal succeeds Mago at Carthage, 728, a. feated and killed by the Sardinians, ibid. b. His character, ibid. c. fent into Sicily, 782, b. Defeated, 783, & fent into Sicily, 843, b. Defeated by Cacilius, 844, b, c. the fon of Hamilear, goes with him into Spain, 865. Narrowly escapes being taken, 866, (M). Succeeds his father there, 867, b, c, (N). His quick fuccess, ibid. d. Raifes the Roman jealousy, ibid. & seq. Makes a treaty with them, 868, a. Murdered by a Gaul, ibid. c. Asia ravaged by the Scythians, 175, a. Submits to Macrinus, 179, a. Ravaged by the Scythians, 180, b, c. Asinius Quadratus's Writings and character, 168, Ajoumes. See Mercury, 689, d. Aspacuras made king of Iberia, 373, a. Forced to divide it with Sauromates, ibid. e. Aspar sent with Placidia into the west, 479, a, b, c, Takes Aquileia from the rebel John, ibid. d. Enters Ravenna, and takes him prisoner, ibid. c, f. Taken prisoner by the Vandals, 482, d. Efcapes, and is defeated by Atila, 489, c. Raises Leo to the throne, 504, d. A great favourer of the Arians, ibid. e. Fatal jealousy of Leo, 510, e. Put to death by him, ibid. f. Aspasius's writings and character, 149, sub not. Aspocastrum, a Turkish fort at the mouth of the Bosporus, 649, d. Asprianus Fulvius's writings and character, 205, (B). Assyria reduced by Trajan, 20, d, e. Aftarte, conjectures concerning that deity, 684, (R). Asteria island, whence so called, 673, (A). Asterius's gigantic remains, ibid. (A). - Success against Gonderic, 473, b, c. Astorga plundered and massacred by the Goths, 505, b. Astulphus the Lombard seizes Ravenna and Pentapolis, 556, d. Stripped of them by Pepin, ibid. e. Asturians waste Tripolis, 349, a, b, c. Afyla. See churches, 422, f. Asa killed by Vallia, 472, e. Atapacus lays waste all Phrygia, 620. Atarbis distresses the Sicilians in Afric, 810, e. Ataulphus sent for into Sicily, 458, a. Deseated, 460, a. Joins Alaric, ibid. b. Raised by Attalus, 461, d. Made king of the Goths in Italy, 465, c. Betrays fovianus to Honorius, 467, e, f. Falls out with him, 468, & feq. Marries Placidia, 469, d. Generosity to her, ibid. e. Flees into Spain, 470, b. Stabbed to death, ibid. e. Atec submits to Maximian, 208, d. Athanarie's apology for aiding Procopius, 369, d, e. Defeated by Valens, 371, b, c. Ratifies the peace with him, ibid. d, e. Invaded by the Hunns, 379, e, f. Retires into the rocks of Caucalanda, 380, e. Takes refuge with Theodofius, 395, c. Hie death, ibid. d. His death, ibid. d.

Athanasius unjustly banished, 265, e, f. Falsly ac-

Χ. cufed, 266, c. Recalled, 267, c. Honoured by young Constantia, 276, e. At the council of Sardica, 277, c. Returns into Egypt, 278, f. Deposed by Constantius, 198, c. Persecuted by him, ibid. d. Recalled by Jovian, 344, d. His creed fent to him, ibid. e. His reception at court, ibid. f. Athenaus's writings and character, 95, fub not. Athenodorus, one of Longinus's generals, 519, d. Beheaded, ibid. e. Ashenians highly favoured by Adrian, 36, b, 42, d. Oppressed by Herodes, 70, d, e. Ashens beautified by Adrian, 42, d. How governed under him, ibid. c. Her walls rebuilt, 180, c. Burnt by the Heruli, 184, d. Resumes its old idolatry under Julian, 324, b. New Athens built, 42, f. Its famed aqueduct finished, 57, c. Atra belieged by Trajan, 24, e. Its situation, ibid. f. Holds out against Severus, 114, f, & seq. Against Artaxerxes, 139, c. Attalus promoted by Honorius, 459, f, & seq. Narrow escape from Alaric, 460, a. Made presect of Rome, ibid. c. Made emperor by Alaric, 461, c. His character and religion, ibid. d. Falls out with Alaric, 463, c, d. Deposed by him, ibid. c. Restored, 464, a. Advice to the Goths, 467, d. Forced to retume the purple, 469, e. Taken prisoner, 472, a. His mild punishment, ibid. b. · Claudius put to death by Heliogabalus, 136, Atthuarii, who, 312, a. Subdued by Julian, ibid. b. Atticus finds a treasure in his house, 3, f. How bid to use it, 4, a. - chosen consul, 438, b. - bishop of Constantinople's kindness to the refuged christians, 474, b. Attila the Hunn's advantageous peace with Rome, 487, d, e. Cruelty to the Hunnish princes, ibid. f. Northern conquests, ibid. & seq. In Thrace, &cc. 488, a, b. Peace with Theodosius, ibid. d. Proud demands on him, ibid. e. Horrid devastations in the empire, 489, b, c. New peace, ibid. d. Falls out with Valentinian, ibid. & seq. Confpired against by Theodosius, 490, b. Reconciled to him, ibid. c. Powerful army against Valentinian, 493, f. High demands on him, 494, b. Ravages in Gaul, ibid. e, f. Repulsed by Etius, 495, b. c. Bravery at the battle of Chalor, ibid. 495, b, c. Bravery at the battle of Chalons, ibid. e, f. Repasses the Rhine, 496, c, d. Enters Italy, ibid. e, f. Cruelty to the Aquileians, ibid. f. Odd retaliation for the Roman pictures, 497, b. Truce with Rome, 497, c. Invades Dauphiné, ibid. d, e. Defeated by the Visigoths, ibid. d, e. His death, ibid. & seq. Attilius Severus banished by Commodus, 88, e. Manlius. Vide Manlius, 835, 2, (S). Attins Patera's writings and character, 273, fub Avari at Rome, who, 531, e. Deprived of their pension by Justin, ibid. f. By Tiberius, 533, f, & seq. Invade the Romans, 535, e. Descated by Priseus, 536, a. Stirred up by Costhoes against Heraclius, 541, c. Aufidius sent against the Catti, 63, c. Augustal, a street in Daphne, why so called, 262, c. Augustodunum rebuilt by Constantius, 211, c. Augustus, the son of Orestes, why so called, 512, c. Crowned emperor, ibid. f. Deposed and resettled by Odoacer, 513, e, f. - the temple of, rebuilt by Adrian, 35, e. Avienus Fest. Rusus's writings and character, 149, Avitianus's bravery against the Saracens, 475, b, c.
Avitus consecrated at Edessa, 133, a, 438, sub nor.
Makes peace with the Goths, 484, e. Made general of the Romans, 501, d. Proclaimed emperor by Theodoric, 502, 2, b. Deposed, 503, f. His death, 504, a.

Aulen

Aulon taken by Robert Guiscard, 609, f. Aulus Gell. a disciple of Favorinus, 47, sub not.

His character of Epictetus, 50, fub nor. Of Calvi-(sus, 60, sub not. Of Fronto, ibid. His writings and character, 85, sub not.

Pomponius raises a revolt in Gaul, 207, e.

Aurelian proclaimed emperor, 187, f. His rise and character, 188, a, b. How diftinguished from his namesake, ibid. Success against the Goths, ibid. b, c. Against the Germans, ibid. d, e. Vandals, ibid. £ Acts of severity, 189, a, b. Inlarges the Roman walls, ibid. b. Marches against Zenobia, ibid. c. Success against her, 190, c, d, e.
Takes her prisoner, 191, b, c. Receives embasfies from all the eastern princes, ibid. e, f. Success in Egypt, 192, b, c. In Ganl, ibid. c, d. His triumph at Rome described, ibid. d, e, f. Kindness to Zenobia, 193, a, b. To Tetricus, ibid. c. Reforms the state, ibid. d, e. His bread-crowns for the people, ibid. f. Success in Gaul, 194, e, f. In Alyricum, ibid. & feq. Affassinated, 195, c. Funeral honours, character, &c. ibid. & feq.

- the historian, his writings, 197, sub not. - family, an account of, 51, a.

pricits, by whom created, 63, a.

Amelianus chosen conful, 445, b. Sacrificed to Gainas, and banished, ibid. d. Escapes to Constan-timople, ibid. e, f.

Aurelius Marcus, his character of Antoninus, 55, d. Created Cafar by him, 57, b. Chosen consul, 57, e, f. Highly esteemed by Antoninus, 58, a, b. Appointed his successor, 59, c. His extract and character, 60, & seq. Various names, 61, b, c. Education and learning, ibid. d, c. Consulfnip, ibid. e. Makes L. Verus his collegue, ibid. f. Takes the furname of Antoninus, ibid. & feq. nerofity to the diffressed Romans, 63, b. Mild government, 64, & feq. Triumphs with Verus over the Parthians, 65, e. Takes the title of pater patrix, ibid. f. Wife regulations during the plague, famine, &c. 66, b, c, d. Marches against the Germans, ibid. c. Success against them, ibid. & seq. Funeral honours to Verus, 67, b, c. Suspected of having hastened his death, ibid. f, & Sells all his riches to carry on the war, 68, paff. Sens all his riches to carry on the paff. Success against the barbarians, 69, c. Meek behaviour to Herodes, ibid. d, e. New victories, ibid. f. Miraculous deliverance by the christians prayers, 71, & feq. Friendship to them, 72, d, e. Continues in Germany, 73, f, & feq. Totally quells it, 73, pass. His two letters concerning Cassius, 74, (F), 75, c, d. Speech to his army against him, 76, b, c. Concern for his death, 77, Letter to the fenate, ibid. b, c. Kindness to his children, ibid. e. Letter to Faustina about them, ibid. & seq. Goes into Egype, 78, b. Shameful mourning for Fauslina, ibid. e. Goes to A. thens, 79, d. Returns to Rome, ibid. & Seq. Great skill in philosophy, 80, b, c. March against the Marcomani, ibid. c, d. Defeats the Germani, ibid.

quies, ibid. & feq. His meditations, 81, b, c. Nemelianus, 7 confpire against Caracalla, 128, Apollinaris, 5 d, e.
 Philippus's writings and character, 149, substitution

c. Sudden death, ibid. d. Character and obse-

Aureolus forced into the imperial dignity, 179, e. His rife and character, ibid. f. Defeats and kills Macrianus, 180, e. Marches into Italy, 184, f. Defeated, 185, a. Defeated and killed, 186, d.

the bridge of, built to his memory, ibid.

Aurum coronarium, what, 54, c. Ausa, from whom descended, 672, b.

Aufonius raifed by Gratian, 389, c. Speech to him, 391, d. Writings and character, 401, (L).

Austin St. his centure of Perphyry, 222, &c feq. sub not. Panegyric on the Roman confuls, 406, d. Zeal for church asyla, 422, f. Sermon on the deliverance of Conflantinople, 437, e, f. Character of Olympius, 457, d. Apology for the destruction of Rome, 465, a.

Ausurians, who, 467, c. Waste Pentapolis, ibid.

Autaritus commands the mercenary Gauls, 859, c. Betrayed by the Nunidians, ibid. & seq. De feated, 860, b. Seized by Hamilear, 862, e, f.

Automela, where situate, So5, (R).

Autun relieved by Constantine, 241, b. By Julian, 297, d.

Auvergne taken by Euric, 510, c.

Auxonius made prefect of Mæia, 370, b. Puts the orthodox to death, 371, a.

Auzoriani, where fituate, 452, b. Ravage Egypt,

Axan fultan's offers of peace rejected by Romanus, 605, c. His fingular generofity to him, ibid. e, f. Treaty with Cultumofes, 606, e, f.

Axieros, what among the Phoenicians, 694, (Y). Azar, the Saracen, defeated in Cilicia, 548, e.

Azarethes commands the Persians against the Romans, 525, a, b.

Azazene, where lited, 474, c. Abandoned by the Romans, ibid. d.

Azotus, not an usurper of the empire, 266, b.

BAal, conjectures concerning that deity, 684, & feq. & (R). - iometimes fignifies the true God, 688, &

Babylas forces the emperor to do penance, 166, b, c. Martyred under Decius, 167, d.

Babylon taken by Trajan, 20, e. Entered by him, 21, a. By Cassius, 65, c. Taken by Severus, 114, b. Badrians ally with Aurian, 37, b. Embasly to Antoninus, 56, f.

Bacurus ferves under Valens. 370, f. Under Theodolius, 424, a. His character and gallantry, ibid.

Bebius Marcel. put to death by Severus, 117, e,f. Betile of the heathers, their origin, 693, a, (X). Bagrada river, described, 671, b, c.

Bagunda defeated by Maximin, 207, e, f. Give a tree paffige to Sarus, 454, d.

Bajazet's iwit conquests in Europe, 646, b. gance to the Greek emperors, ibid. c, d. Defeats 130,000 christians, ibid. c, f. Defeated by Tamerlan, 647, d. His difmal end, ibid. e.

Balamir king of the Hunns, 379, d.
Balbinus Dec. made Caracalla's collegue, 125, d. Chosen emperor by the senate, 156, e, f. His extract and character, 157, b, c. Wounded in a tumult, 158, c. Great joy at Maximin's death, 160, a, b, c. Grows jealous of Maximus, ibid. e, Killed by the prætorian guards, 161, a, b.

Balchobaudes's cowardice and arrogance, 351, b. Baldwin faves Edeffa, 619, f. Sudden difappearing, Crowned emperor of Constantinople, 618, 2, Defeat and miserable end, ibid. d, e.

II. crowned Latin emperor at Constantinople, 630, f, 631, f. Driven out of it, 633, d. Balearic islands ravaged by the Vandals, 480, b, c. Balearics, expert flingers, 792, (F).

Balista's success against the Persians, 177, b. Goes over to Macrianus, 178, f. Takes the imperial title, 180, f. & seq. Murdered, 182, c.

Barahanes kills Siroes, and mounts the throne, 542, Barames dethrones Hormislas, 535, b, c.

Barbas's treachery to Theodislus, 571, b. Tyranny under Michael, 572, a, b. Murdered, ibid. c, Barbatio, a bitter enemy to Gallus, 293, b, d. Treachery and death, 300, b, 305, a.

-1

Barbars suppressed by Julian, 325, e. Barca goes with Dido into Afric, 719, e, f. Barchine or Barcan family at Carthage, 707, (L),& feq. 848,(C). Barcokebas, a talse messiah, stirs up the Jews, 39, a. Deteated and imprisoned, 40, a. Bardanes's revolt, 561, b. Eyes put out, ibid. c. Bardas defeated by the Romans, 580. - Phocas's revolt, 585, d, e. Punishment, 586, a. b. Proclaimed emperor, 590, b. Treachery to Sclerus, ibid. d, e. Death, 591, a.

Sclerus's success against the Ross, 587, d.

Defeats Bardas Phocas, ibid. b. Defeated by him, ibid. c, d. Imprisoned by Cosrhoes, ibid. e, f. By Phocas. 590, d. Submits to Basilius, 591, b. Bargus, the infamous betrayer of Timafius, 436, d, c. Put to death, 437, c.

Baronius, a mistake of, rectified, 404, c.

Bafil St. first acquaintance with Julian at Athens, 322, a. Resuses his invitation to court, ibid. d. Studies under Proereses, 333, sub not. Strives in vain to convert Valens, 372, b, c. Basilianus holds out for Macrinus, 134. Put to death, ibid. Basilina, mother of Julian, her descent, 319, 2. Basilica or Basilius's laws, whence so called, 574, c. Basiliscus made admiral of Leo's fleet, 509, a. Treachery and defeat, 509, d, e, f. Declared emperor, 513, b. His extortions and herely, 514, d, e. Refigns his crown, 515, a. Death, ibid. b. - the fon of Harmatius, created Cafar, 515, Deposed, ibid. b. Made bishop of Cizicus, ibid. c. Tiberius declared emperor, 551, e. Put to death, ibid. Basilitzas, an infamous favourite of Alexander, 577, Basilius sent to treat with Alaric, 458, d. - a favourite of Michael, created Casar, 572, d. His extract and character, ibid. d, e. Over-reaches Bardas, ibid. e, f. Kills the emperor, ibid. f. Makes two of his sons Casars, 573, a. Defeats the Manichees, ibid. b. Success against the Saracens, ibid. c. Builds a great number of churches, ibid. e. His death, 574, b. Wise instructions to his son, ibid. c. an impostor's treason and death, 580, a, b. an extortioning eunuch, 587, c, d. Poisons the emperor, ibid. e. Defcated by Sclerus, 588, d, e, f. the fon of Romanus, made collegue with Remisces, 585. Defeated by Scierus, 588, & feq. Ill success against the Bulgarians, 589, f. Defeats Bardas Phocas, 590, & feq. Wars against the Bulgarians, 591, d, e. Cruelty to them, 592, a. Subdues them, ibid. paff. Against the Saracens, 593, a. Death, character, ibid. b. Basseus promoted for his valour, 70, e. Bassi, the family of, converted, 415, d. Bassianus. Vide Caracalla, 104, & seq. - Vide Heliogabalus, 133, & feq. fripped of his estate, 374, c.

Bassus Pomponius put to death by Heliogabalus, 136, Baftarna settled in Thrace, 201, d. Transplanted, 215, d. Batavia cleared of all the Franks, 213, b. Batavinus defeated by the Germans, 350, e. Baudo sent to Theodosius's assistance, 396, b. Banto chosen conful, 406. Beauvois peopled by the Franks, 213, b.
Beda's account of the Roman wall in Britain, 118, f. Beggars suppressed by Gratian, 396, d. Belimer marches to fuccour Rome, 511, b. Defeated by Ricimer, ibid. d. Belissarus defeated by the Persians, 523, d. Made commander on the Persian frontiers, ibid. e. For-tifies them, 524, c. Forced to abandon them, ibid. d. Defeats the Persiane, ibid. e, & 525, c. Appeales a revolt at Constantinople, 526, b. Sent into Afric, ibid. c, d. Recalled against the Perfians, 527, d, e. Drives away the Hunns, 529, d. Difgraced and stripped, ibid. e, f. Cleared and restored, 530, 2.

Beltis. Vide Urania, 685, & seq. Belus, many deities of that name, 686, & seq. Beneventum, the highway of, made by Trajan, 19, f. Beermor descated by Ricimer, 507, e.
Berean christians just reproof to Julian, 330, b, c. Bergula, whence furnamed Arcadianopolis, 450, & Bersabora taken and burnt by Julian, 332, c. Berytus ruined by an earthquake, 278, f.
Bessus's success against the Persians, 528, e, f. Bether taken from the Jews, 39, f. Bineses sent to take possession of Nisibis, 343, c, d. Birtha repulses the Persians, 308, c. Births, two strange ones under Theodosius, 416, b. Bishops, their immunities under Constantius, 277, e, f. — orthodox restored, 278. How to be tried, 294, b. Why recalled by Julian, 325, f. Privileged by Theodosius, 396, a. Bithynia adorned by Adrian, 36, 2. And restored, ibid. c. Declares for Cassius, 76, 2. Ravaged by the Scythians, 180, a. Submits to Licinius, 252, f. Bito made governor of Motya, 758, c. Bleda, the Hunn, makes peace with Theodofus, 487, e, f. Blemmyes, where fired, 201, c. Defeated by Probus, ibid. Pliny's fabulous account of them, ibid. d. Wars with the Moors, 209, c. Inroads into Egypt, 213, e, f. Embassy to Constantine, 264, f. Repulled by Marcian, 498, b. Boanas defeated by the Saracens, 543, c, d. Boaica reduced by the Hunns, 488, d. Boetius murdered by Valentinian, 499, b. Bohemond's success against Alexius, 610, f, & seq. Narrow escape, 615, d. Enters Antioch, ibid. f. Made prince of it, 616, a. Wars with Alexius, ibid. c. Raises new forces in Italy, ibid. d, e. Returns and belieges Dyrrhachium, ibid. f. Makes peace with Alexius, 617, a. His death, ibid. b. Bolus, a Persian fortress, betrayed to the Romans, 525.
Bomilear sent against Agathoeles, 796, d, e. His fatal ambition and treachery, 797, & seq. Assumes the fovereignty of Carthage, 806, & seq. Defeated and crucified, 807, a, b. Bonifacius, count, repulles Ataulphus from Marseilles, portfactus, count, repuiles Alampons from Marfeilles, 469, a. Highly rewarded by Placidia, 480, d. Undermined by Ætius, ibid. e, f. Defeats and kills Sinex, 481, a. Invites the barbarians into Afric, ibid. c, d. Belieged by them, 482, a, b. Returns to Italy, 482, b. Sent by Placidia against Ætius, ibid. c. Killed, ibid. e. made king of Theffaly, 628, 2. Bononia in Illyricum, where sited, 257, a.
Bonosus's rise and revolt, 202, b, d. Death, ibid.e. - fent against the revolted Jews, 538, d. Bonus, governor of young Constantius, 540, b. Boodes lent to surprise the Roman fleet, 830, d, e. Books, 120,000 burnt at Constantinople, 515, c. Borani revolt in Gaul, 171, c. Success against the Romans, 174, c.
Borifes taken prisoner, 586, d.
Bosporans cruelly butchered by Justinian, 549, d.
Join with the Chazari against him, ibid. e. Bosporus submits to Trajan, 18, c. Bostar joined to Hanno against Rome, 837, c. Defeated before Adda, 838, a, b. His miserable end, 842, b, (W). Bostra taken by Haumar, 543, b. Boterius murdered at Thessalonica, 427, 2. Bourdeaux receives Ataulphus, 469, b. Branas's tatal rashness and defeat, 611, d, e. defeats the Sicilians, 623, b. Revolts, ibid. c. Defeated and killed, ibid. e. Bre-

H

```
Betagne, whence so called, 508; a.
Bretania Armorica, three different colonies sent into,
  4.00. C.
```

Bribery punished by Valentinian, 355, c.
Brienne, John de, made guardian of Baldwin II. 630, f. Defeats Azem and Ducas, 631, a, b. His death, ibid. c.

Brigantes in Britain reduced by the Romans, 57,

Britain visited by Adrian, 35, a, b. Walls built in it by him, ibid. c. Reduced by Conflancine, 212, f. How divided by him, 270, f. Invaded by the Picts, 353, b. Defeated by Stilicho, 441, b, c. Abandoned by the Romans, 514, a.

Britons punished for offering human victims, 27, 2. War with the Romans, 63, c—e. Harass them, 114, d. Revolt, 117, t, & seq. 202, f. Afresh from the Romans, 462, c. Invaded by the Piets and Scots, 489, a. Settle in Vennes, &c. 508, Britons follow Maximin into Gaul, 400, d. Settle in Bretagne, ibid. c.

Bruchium, the siege of, 182, a. Destroyed by Zenobia, 187, c.

Bructerians defeated in Germany, 8, e. Where seated, ibid. f. Defeated by Constantine, 234, b, 239,

d. Invaded by Eugenius, 423, c, d.

Bryennius recalled, 601, f. Quarrel with Opparas, 602, b. Eyes put out by him, ibid. b.

revolt and defeat, 607, d, e. Taken pri-foner, ibid f, & feq.

Buchanan's account of the Roman wall in Britain,

Bucherius's writings and character, 318, & feq. sub

Bulgaria a part of Thrace, 255, a. Whence so called, 546, c.

Bulgarians defeat Arisius, 520, a. Invade the empire with 100,000 men, 546, e. Make peace with it, ibid. Defeat Justinian, 547, a, b. Ravage quite to Constantinople, 550, b. Assist Anastasius, 551, f. Irruptions into the east, 555, & seq. Totally defeated, 556, a. Put to flight by Conflan-tine, 559, b. c. Success against Nicephorus, 562, tine, 559, b, c. Success against Nicephorus, 562, b. Against Michael, ibid. e, f. Against Constan-D. Against Michael, ibid. e, f. Against Constantine, 579, & seq. Defeated, 591, & seq. Submit to Basilius, 592, b, c. Revolt, 596, e, f. Defeat the Latins, 628, e. Defeated by Andronicus, 641, c. Make peace with him, ibid. d.

Burgundi revolt in Gaul, 171, c. Transplanted into Cambridgeshire, 201, a. Defeated by Maximian, 208, a., Existence Valentinian and C. Their 208, a. Exasperate Valentinian, 356, c. Their true origin, &c. ibid. d, e. Join with the Vandals, 453, e. Their kingdom in Gaul, how founded, 468, d. 20,000 killed by the Hunns, 483, b. Settle in Savoy, 485, c. Seize on part of Gaul, 504, a, b.

Buri revolt against the Romans, 63, c. Submit, ibid. d.

Burrhus Antistius betrayed to death by Cleander, 89, e, f.

e, f.

Burizas ill requited by Nicephorus, 584, b, c.

Busan surrendered to Sapor, 307, a.

Busaris destroyed by Dioclesian, 213, d.

Buthrotum taken by Guiscard, 609, f.

Buzes deseated by the Romans, 524, d. Abandons

Syria to the Persians, 526, e.
Byria, the citadel of Carthage, described, 661, e. Whence fo called, 662, e, f.

Byzantium holds out against Severus, 105, b. Garrisoned by Niger, 108, e, s. Besieged by Severus, 109, a. Surrendered and burnt, 111, b, c. Slaughtered by Gallienus, 181, c, d. Taken by Maximin, 252, c. Beautified by Constantine, 263. The rest see under Constantinople, ibid. & seq.

Byzatium described, 668, & seq. Whence called Libyphænicia, 673, a, (B).

Vol. VI. Nº 12

Abades invades Armenia, 520, b, c, d. Defeats the Romans, d, e. Makes a truce of 20 years with them, 521. Embassy to Justinian, 523, c. Wars with him, 524, c, d, e. His death, 525, e. Cabi invade the empire, 125, f.

Cabiri, their worship, &c. at Carthage, 694, 2, b. Caccabe, Carthage whence fo called, 661, b. Cadmus's expedition to Carthage, 658, b, c.

Cacilianus sent to, and promoted by, Honorius, 459, f, & feq. Cacilius, bishop of Carthage, highly honoured by Constantine, 251, d, f.

- Roman conful's fuccess against the Carthaginians, 844, & seq.

Caranius, the philosopher, tortured to death, 375, d. Casarea rebuilt by Adrian, 36, c. The terrible fate of, under Sapor, 177, a. Taken by Firmus, 359, b. Razed by Basilius, 573, d.

Cafarius fent to judge the Antiochians, 409, b. His character, ibid. c. Severity to them, ibid. f, & feq. Softened, 410, d, e. Goes to fotten Theodofins towards them, 411, b. Chosen conful, 438, Caledonians defeated by the Romans, 87, d, e. Make peace with Severus, 118, d.

Callicrates's writings and character, 197, sub not. Callinicus Sutorius's Writings and character, 60, sub the Heliopolitan's invention of sea-fire, 546, b.

patriarch of Constantinople, causes Justinian to be deposed, 547, e. His punishment, 549, c. Callistrates's writings and character, 149, sub not. Calournius's account of Carus's death, 204, e, f. Calvisia generously treated by Pliny, 29, sub not. Calvifius Taurus's writings and character, 60, fub

Flavius sides with Cassius, 76,2. Banished,

Camarina taken by the Romans, 833, c. Camicus taken by the Romans, 833, c, d. Campanians assist Hannibal, 742, & feq. Discharged and displeased by him, 744, f, & seq. Left to guard Sicily, 753, 2, b. Campona, where fituate, 257, 2.

Canaanites retire to Carthage, 658, b.
Candax and his subjects settled in Scythia Minor, 496, b.

Candia, by whom built, 566, d. Candidianus recommended to Maximin, 240, c. Put to death by him, ibid. d.

consulfhip and command in the west, 479,

Candidius's writings and character, 517, (V).
Cantacusenus, a wicked tool of Andronicus, 638, &c. 642, & feq. Made guardian to young John, 643, Undermined by John the patriarch, ibid. b. Proferibed, ibid. c. Aflumes the purple, ibid. d. Marches towards Conflantinople, ibid. e, f. Overreached and attempted, 644, c, d. Enters that metropolis, ibid. e, f. Crowned, 645, a. Refigns, and turns monk, ibid. c.

Canthele, where situate, 667, c. Capellaris defeats the Gordians, 155, c, d.
Capellas's philological writings, 478, fub not.
Capito Titin's writings and character, 29, fub not. Ignatius put to death by Commodus, 88, Greek version of Ammianus, 386, sub nor. Capitol forfaken, and left to ruin, 415, e, f. Capitoline games exhibited, 16, b.

Capitolinus Jul. account of Antoninus, 55, & seq. Writings and character, 220, (C).

Cappadocia ravaged by the Persians, 141, f, 177, 2. How divided by Valens, 372, d.

Capfo, where fituate, 670, c.

io P

CATA-

Caracalla born to Severus, 104, f. Created Cæfar, 111, f. And partner of the empire, 114, c. Takes the manly robe, 115, b. Triumphs over the Jorus, 116, b. Attempts his father's life, 119, d. And his crown, ibid. f. Succeeds him, 121, a. Attempts Geta's life, 122, b, c, d. Cruel reign, ibid. & seq. Murders his brother, ibid. d, e, f. Stratagems to gain the soldiers, 123, a, b, c. Speech to the femate, ibid. d. Deifies Geta, ibid e. Massacres all his friends, ibid. f, & seq. Horrid cruelties and butcheries, 124, & feq. varice and extortions, 125, a. Coins false money, ibid. Governed by his flaves, ibid. b, c. Infranchifes all his subjects, ibid. c. Cruelties in Gaul, ibid. d, e. Whence named Caracalla, ibid. e, f. Ill fuccess in Germany, 126, a, b. At Pergamos, ibid. d. Changes his habit and style in every place, ibid. e. Apes Alexander the Great, ibid. f. Goes to Antioch, 127, a. Treachery to the Armenians, ibid. b. Massacre at Alexandria, ibid. c, spired against, ibid. d, e. Stabbed to death, ibid. f. Funeral oblequies by his murderers, 130, 6, Deined, 131, a. Caracia fours the neighbourhood of Conflantinople, 650, d.

Caraufius murdered in Britain, 211, c.

Carbeas, head of the Manichees, flees to the Saracens, 571, a. Defeated by Basilius, 573, b.

Cardueni subdued by Trajan, 21, b.

Carinus created Cæfar, 204, c. His character, ibid. d. Marches against Dioclesian, 206, f. Killed, Carnution, where fituate, 363, a. Carofa, the daughter of Valens, 385. d. Carofe, Thermæ, at Conflantinople, 369.

Caroufius's fuccess and revolt in Britain, 208, a, b. Takes it, and reigns in it, ibid. e, f.

Carpetani subdued by Hannibal, 869, e, f.

Carpi ravage Massia, 160, c. Deseated, 166, d. By Decius, 169, d. Transplanted into Pannonia, 212, a.

Carpis, where fituate, 666, d, e. Carpodax defeated by Theodofius, 396, b.

Carrba retiken by the Perfians, 162, b, d. Carthage founded, 657, paif. By whom, 658, b, 659, b, c. Its various names and etymons, ibid. & feq. Described, 661, & feq. Its extent, 663, c, d. Old ruins, ibid. e. Division, 665, a. Situation, ibid. b. Government, 674, & feq. Senate, tion, feid. B. Government, 674, & feq. Senate, 675, & feq. & (G). Centumvirate and quinque-virate, 676, & feq. Officers, 678, & feq. Laws, 679, & feq. Their defects, 680, & feq. Antient thate very powerful, 723, & feq. Burnt by Maxentius, 221, c, d. Submits to Arcadius, 428, f. Taken by Sigifwall, 481, a. By Genseric, 484, f. & seq. By Macheus, 725, e, f. Threatened by the mercenaries, 861, d, e. Relieved by Hamilcar, 262, c.

- the square of, restored by Antoninus, 59, a. Carthagena seized by the Alans, 463, a. By the Hunns, 428, d. By the Suevians, 503, a, b. By whom built, 867, c, d.

Carthaginians, from whom fprung, 658, b, c. Their various names, 661, b. How populous, 663, b. Extent of their dominions, 664, a, (I). Antient Canaanites, 672, & seq. Sacrifice noble children to Saturn, 679, a, b. Forbid to learn Greek, ibid. Their religion, 681, & feq. And various deities, ibid. Portable temples, 693, c. Language, 697, & feq. Character and coin, 703, & feq. Arts and sciences, 704, & seq. Customs, 705, past, Hospitality, ibid, e, f. Character, 706, & seq. The genealogy of their noble families, 707. Commerce and military discipline, 708, a, b,c. Learned men, ibid. & seq. Expert artificers, ibid. (M). Writers, 709, pass. Trade and navigation, 710, & feq. Chronology, 712, & feq. Wars with the Etruscans, &c. 724, past. With Sicily, ibid. & feq. First treaty with the Romans, 727, past. 774, b, 779, a. Continue tributary to the Africans, 728, c. Courted by Darius, ibid. d. III fuccess in Sicily, ibid. & seq. League with Xerxes, 729, a, b. First footing in Spain, ibid. b, c. Colony at Ebusus, ibid. e. First footing in Corfica, 731, b, c. Expedition against Sicily, ibid. & feq. Defeated by Gelon, 732, f, & feq. Sue for peace, 735, a, b. Shake off the African tribute, 736, d. Quarrels with the Cyreneans, 1010. & 104. On the Egyptians, 738, a. Barbarity to the Selinuntines, 74t, & seq. Repulsed before Himera, 743, pass. Take Agrigentum, 746, & seq. Gela, 750, Method of encamping, ibid. (N). De-Quarrels with the Cyreneans, ibid. & feq. Succour stroyed by a grievous plague, 753, a, & seq. Preparations against Dionysius, 756, a, b, c. Ravaged by him, 759, a. Defeated at sea, ibid. d, 764, c. A strange plague in their army, 765, a, b. That distemper described, ibid. & seq. Descated, 726, 768, c, d. New preparations against Sicily, 770, a, b. Ill success there, ibid. & seq. Under a fresh plague, 773, b, c. Make peace with Dionysus 11.

774, c, d. Undermine the Syracustans, ibid. (F), & seq. Bassled by Timoleon, 775, & seq. Let into Syracuse by Icelas, 779, c. Fresh preparations against Sicily, 782, a, b, c. Defeated by Timoleon, 783, & feq. Suffer a terrible loss, 784, & feq. Make peace with him, 786, c, d, In fear of Alexander, 788, b, c. War with Agathocles, 789, & feq. Invaded and ravaged by him, 795, & feq. Defeated by him, 797, & feq. Their horrid fupersition, 798, d, e, f, & 811. Their camp in stames, ibid. d. Put an end to the Sicilian war, 812, d, e, f. Renew it, 813, & feq. Defensive treaty with Rome, 814, & feq. Drive Pyrrbus out of Italy, 816, pass. War with the Romans, 819, & feq. Their motives to it, 821, & feq. Drive Prepare out of Sardinia and Sicily, 832, & seq. to attack the Romans by sea, 835, c, d. Totally defeated, 836, pass. 838, a, b. Saved by Xantippus, 839, & seq. Ingratitude to him, 840, f. Attended with new disasters, 842, & seq. Defeated by Lutatius, 850, b, c. Make peace with him, ibid. & seq. War with the mercenaries, 851, & seq. The cause of it, ibid. & 855, c, d. Preparations against them, ibid. ad fin. - women profittuted themselves for gain, 696, c, d, (B).

Carthalo disobeys his father, 725, d. Crucified by him, ibid. f.

fuccefs against the Romans, 847, b, c. Recalled for his indifcretion, ibid. e.

Carus proclaimed emperor, 203. His rise and character, 204, a, b. Success against the Sarmatians, ibid. c, d. Against the Persians, ibid. d, e. His death and obsequies, ibid. f, & seq.

Casperius raises a tumult against Nerva, 5, b. Punished, ibid, Cassandria destroyed by the Hunns, 726, e. Cassianus, bishop of Jerusalem, 41, b. killed by the cruisadors, 615, f.

Caffiodorus publishes the historia tripartita, 491, (S). Cassius Dion's judgment about Adrian's adoption, 25, f. fuccess against the Parthians, 64, b, c, 65, c. Barbarity to Seleucia, ibid. d. Ill state of his army, ibid. & feq. Success in Egrpt, 70, a. Revolt and character, 63, & seq. Inhuman severity, 64, a, b. Sent into Syria, ibid. c. Reforms the army there, ibid. d, (F). Hatred to monarchy, 75, a, b. His character drawn by Verus, ibid. b, c.

Proclaims himself emperor, 75, f. Proscribed by the senate, 76, d. His death, ibid. d, e, & seq. Castinus's fuccess and ill-timed rashness in Spain, 475, d, e. Stirs up John to revolt, 478, a. Banished, 480, a. Castor put to death by Caracalla, 122, b. Castration forbid by Nerva, 4, a. Cataceles's success against Thomas, 565, f, & seq. Catada, river, described, 671, b, c. Catalacunian plains, whether the same with the Mauriae, 495, b, c.

Catalans hired by the Greek emperors, 636, a. Ravage his dominions, ibid. b. Invite the Turks to join, ibid. & feq. Casapultæ described, 750, (O), 757, (H). Caunuband killed by Aurelian, 190, a. Cecrops, bishop, killed by an earthquake, 304, d. Celer Verian's bloody orders against the Massians, 175, d. Anastasius's general, ravages Arzanene, 510, e, f. Celsus put to death, 34, c. his writings and character, 81, (H).

Cornel. declared emperor, 182, f. death, ibid. & feq Celtes raise a drunken uproar in Asdrubal's camp, 835, a. Deseated in Spain, 866, (M).
Censor, the office of, restored by Decius, 169, e. Its nature, &c. ibid. f. Censorinus's writings and character, 164, (W). - besieged and taken prisoner, 485, c. Centum columnæ, a Roman building, burnt, 166. Centum portes, by whom built, 13, c. Centuripe taken by the Romans, 827. Cephalenæ island given to the Athenians, 42, d. Cephisus, the bridge over, built by Adrian, 35, f, & Ceres, one of the Carthaginian deities, 689, c. Her temple plundered, 764, a. Certus, a senator, impeached by Pliny, 4, c. Dies of grief, ibid. d. Cethegus, a senator, put to death, 357, b.

Chabdanus's revenge on Lee, 581, a. On Phocas, ibid. b. Deseated, 582, d. Chaedrante, an antient name of Carthage, 672, d. Chagan, king of the Avari, invites the Romans, 534. Makes a truce, and breaks it, 535, e. His army destroyed by pestilence, ibid. &c. Cruelty to his prisoners, 536, a. Makes peace with Heraclius, 540. Kindness to by Tiberius, ibid. Kindness to Justinian, 548, f. Bought off Chaifes, post, by whom invented, 26, b. Chalcedon taken by the Scythians, 174, c. Destroyed by them, 180, d. Taken by Marcellus, 369, a. Difmantled by Valens, ibid. c. the court of justice of, founded, 324, e. Chalcis plundered by Chofroes, 527, b. Chaldea subdued by Trajan, 20, e. Chalons, the battle of, 495, d, e, f. Number of the flain, 496, b. Chamavia defeated, 239, d. By Julian, 304, a. Invaded by Eugenius, 423, c, d. Charcedon, the Greek name of Carthage, 658, c, 661, a, (E). Charieto, whether killed by the Germans, 350, e. Chariots, armed, their origin, use, &c. 783, (B).

Chazari, who, 541, d. 40,000 join Heraclius, ibid. Chersonians horridly butchered by Justinian, 549, d. Submit to Philippicus, ibid. e. Cherusci deseated by Constantine, 239, d. Chefnuts eaten instead of corn, 463, c. Childeric taken prisoner, 494, e. Children, poor, how provided for by Constantine, 255, a. four, eaten by their mothers, 462, e. Chilo L. Fab. a friend of Caracalla, doomed to death by him, 124, b. Rescued by the people, and spared, ibid. c, d. accused of witchcraft, 356, e. Chios taken by the Turks, 611, f.
Chnodomarius heads the barbarians against Julian, 301, a. Descated and taken, ibid. c. Christianity flourishes under Philip, 165, c, 167, d, e. Christians tolerated by Nerva, 3, d. Persecuted by Trajan, 27, b, c. By the Jews, 39, b. Delivered and parted from them, 41, a, b. Persecuted by Adrian, 48, d. Favoured by Antoninus, 58, e. Their prayers obtain a miraculous victory, 71, & feq. Favoured by M. Aurelius, 72, c, d. Why favoured by Alexander, 138, f. Grievoully butchered by Decius, 168, & seq. By Gallus, 171, b. By Valerian, 173, c, f. By Dioclefian, 278, pass. By Maximin, 250, c, d. Confian, 278, pass. By Maximin, 250, c, d. Conflantine's edicts in their favour, 248, a, 250, e. Forbid to turn Jews, 302, c. Great joy at Julian's death, 335, a. Encouraged by Jovian, 345, & seq. Massacred by Gerontius, 466, a. By the Jews at Alexandria, 471, b. Barbarity to Hypatia, ibid. d, e. Persecuted in Persia, 474, b, c. Their liberty restored, 475, d, e. Massacred by the Jews, 538, d, 539, e. By the Mobammedans, 551, d, e. By the Saracnes, 557, a. bristian women exempted from stage-playing, 202. Christian women exempted from stage-playing, 393, Christopher banished and murdered, 559, d. the fon of Romanus, crowned, 579, c. His death, 580, a. bronos. Vide Saturn, 681, & feq. Chronos. Chrysanthus refuses Julian's invitation, 326, b, c. Made pontiff of Lydia, ibid. c. His writings and character, 339, sub not. Chrysaphus's treachery to Attila, 490, b. Forgiven, ibid. c. Chrysargyrum, what, 269, d. Falily attributed to Constantine, ibid c. Abolished by Anastasius, 518, a, b, c. Various forts of it, ibid. d, e. Chrysoftom's narrow escape, 375, e, f. Excellent homilies to the Antiochians, 408, e. Dreadful account of their trials and punishments, ibid. & seq. Intercedes for them, 410, c. His fingular piety to the prisoners, 511, b. Joyful speech at their being pardoned, 412, b. Panegyric on Eudoxia, 433, a. Banished by her, 437, c. Letters to Pentadia, ibid. d. Zeal for the church asyla, 443, f, & seq. Saves the lives of three great persons, 445, e. Intrepidity against the Arians, 446, a, b. Banishment, 451, c. His manuscripts burnt, 558, c. burnt, 558, c. Chrysotelia, a new tax, raised by Anastasius, 519, b. Churches, when first made sanctuaries, 422, f. Suppressed by Entropius, 437, d. Restored, ibid. e. Respected by Alaric, 464, d. And by the Goths, ibid. e. By Honorius, 470, b, c. Inlarged sity paces round, 473, b.

Chymical books in Egypt, burnt by Dioclesian, 213, d. Ciaconius's account of Trajan's column, 26, d, c.

Cilicia abandoned to Severus Loo. d. Payaged by Cilicia abandoned to Severus, 109, d. Ravaged by Cios, general of the Mamertines, 818, c, (L). Defeat and desperate end, ibid. d, e.

Cir-

Sapor, 177, a.

Charles the Great's embassy to Irene, 560. Acknow-of Anjou, makes peace with Paleologus, 634, ledged emperor of the west, 561, a.

Chauci defeated by the Romons, 63, d.

f. Gets him excommunicated, 635, a. Charms and other witcheries severely punished, 375, Chartaca, an antient name of Carthage, 659, d.

1

Circumcella, the antient name of Civita Vecchia, 477,

Civic crowns, on whom bestowed, 173, f, & seq. Cizyeum taken by Procopius, 367.

Classicus accused of extortion, 10, e. Kills himfelf, Claudian's poem on Eutropius, 435, & feq. & (N). On Honorius's marriage, 441, a. On Stilicho's exploits, ibid. b, c. On Manlius's consulship, ibid. e. His other writings and character, 476, (R).

Claudiopolis taken by Diogenes, 519, c. Claudius inlarges Alexander's museum, 37, f.

- Maximus's writings and character, 60, sub

e. His character, ibid. f. Chosen consul, 77, b, 78, b. Piots against Commodus, 87, f. Refuses the empire from Pertinax, 95, b. From Julianus, 106, b.

- the emperor's cautious letter to Regillianus, 175, f. Funeral obsequies of Gallienus, 185, e. Proclaimed emperor, 186, a. His extract, rife, Defeats Aureolus, ibid. d. Funeese. ibid. b, c. ် ral honours to him, ibid. Success against the Germans, ibid. e. Against the Goths, ibid. f, & sicq. His two letters on his tignal victory, 187, a, b. Death and character, ibid. d. Funeral honours, ibid. & feq.

- Appius sent into Sicily, 822, d. Message to Hiero, 825, a, b. Stratagem to land there, ibid. c, d, (F). Takes Messana, 826, d, e. Returns to Rome, ibid. f. Deteated at sea, 846, d, e.

- Caius sent into Sicily, 822, d, e. Gains over the Mamertines, 823, path. Puts forces into Mef-fana, 824, b, c. Treachery to Hanno, ibid. c.

Cleander succeeds Perennis as prime minister, 89. His wicked administration, ibid. & feq. Universally hated, 90, f. Put to death with his family, 91, Clearchus's rife and character, 403, b. Clematius put to death for his chaftity, 29, a. Clemens's letter to Valentinian, 359, b. Clergy, their immunities under Constantine, 248, c, d, 251, pass. Under Constantius, 277, b, 279, a, 302, c. Renewed by fovian, 344, b, c. Curtailed by Valentinian, 357, e. Iniarged by Gratian, 382, c, d. By Honorius, 439, (E). By Marcian, 501, d, e.

Clitomachus's writings and character, 709, e, f.

Clodius defeated by Ætius, 4$1, d.

Clovis defeats Theodoric, 521, d. Congratulated for it by Anastasius, ibid. & feq.

Clyppea, where intuate, 667, b. Taken by the Romans, 837, a.

Coche taken by Carus, 204, e. Described, it id. Code of Justinian, 484, b, 530, past. Of Theodosius, Gives way to a second, 530, f.

Caelestis den. Vide Urania, 685, & seq. Her an-swer to Antoninus Pius, 55, b. Her temple at Carthage turned into a church, 445, a.

Calus, the supposed father of Helena, 230, a. Canapharium, Aurelian's stately tomb at, 195, b, c.

Cohorts, how regulated by Adrian, 47, c.

Coimbra taken by the Suevians, 507, e. Coiners of falle money feverely punished, 194, d.

Colchis submits to Trajan, 18, c. Cologn taken by the Franks, 296, c. Restored by Julian, 297, c.

Coloffus of Rhodes destroyed by the Saracens, 544, d. The weight of it, ibid. e.

Comes domesticorum at Rome, what, 172, b. Comet appears under Theodofius, 416, b. Under Confiantine IV. 557, c, f. Under Ducas, 603, e. Under Comites, their office, 271, e. By whom founded, 272, 1. Commentiolis's success against the Persians, 535, a. b. Pur to death by Phocas, 536, e, 538, c. Commo, Common. the birth place of Pliny, 29, sub not. His benefretions to it, ibid.

Commodiana colonia, Rome whence so mamed, 92, f. Commodianus's writings and character, 275, sub note Commodus L. Verus. Vide sub Verus, 44, & seq.

the emperor, born, 62, c. Created Cafar,

65, e. Takes the manly robe, 76, c. Raised to the tribuneship, 78, b. Accompanies his father, ibid. c. His legitimacy much questioned, ibid. d, &c 85, b. Chosen consul, 79, e. Enters Rame with his father, ibid. e, f. Styled pater patria, ibid. f. Marries Crispina, 80, a. Marches against the Mar-comans, ibid. b. His character and bloody reign, 85, & seq. Herculean exploits, 86, b, c. Avarice and rapine, ibid. d, e. Stay in Pannonia, ibid. f. Makes peace with the Marcomans, &c. 87, a. Triumph at Rome, ibid. b. Takes the name of Pius and Britannicus, ibid. d. Escapes being murdered, 88, a. Bloody profecutions, ibid. pass. Retires to Laurentum, 90, d. Assaulted in the Quintilian palace, 91, b, c. New butcheries, ibid. & feq. Ridiculous extravagancies, 92, d, e. Changes the names of the months, ibid. c. Conspired against, 93, b, c. Strangled, ibid. f. His burial, Ge. 94, a. Good deeds recorded of him, ibid. b. His riches and catamites fold by Persinax, 97, pass. Letter to Albinus in Britain, 102, (K). Deissied by Severus, 113, e.

Comnenus, Isaac, chosen emperor, 601, f, & seq. Defeats Stratonicus, 602, pass. Crowned, 603,

a. Resigns, ibid. c, d.

Alexius's fuccess against the rebel Rutilius, 607, a, b. Sent against Bryennius, ibid. c, d. Stratagem against him, ibid. e, f. Against Basiliacius, 608, a. Chosen emperor, ibid. d, e. Crowned, 609, b. Does penance, ibid. c. Makes peace with the Turks, ibid. d. Marches against count Guiscard, 610, b, c. His deseat and flight, ibid. e. By the Scythians, 611, e. Signal defeat of them, 612, a. Second defeat and peace with them, 613, a, b. Jealoufy of the cruifadors, 614, c, d. Treachery to them, 616, b. Success against the Turks, ibid. c. Falls out with Bohemond, ibid. d. Makes peace with him, 617, 2. And with the Turks, ibid. b. His death and character, ibid. &c.

John, his son, declared emperor, 617, d. Defeats several barbarians, 618, a. Reduces several provinces, ibid. b, c. Impious attempt upon Antioch, ibid. d, e. Death, ibid. Singular character, ibid, f, & seq.

Alexius II. Vide sub Alexius, 620, e. Cniva invades the Roman territories, 169, 2, b. Success against them, ibid. c.

Concubines forbid by Constantine, 256, e. Conen Meriodoc comes into Britain, 400, f.

- bishop of Claudianopolis's bravery against the Romans, 510, c. Slain, ibid. d.

Constantia, the daughter of Constantius, 226, e. Married to Licinius, 227, 2, 250, c. the daughter of Constantine, born, 235, c.

When converted, 244, e.

- daughter of Constantius, born, 314, a. Narrow escape, 362, a.

Conflantianus s rife and death, 352, e.

Constantina, the widow of Annibalianus, 266, a. Married to Gallus, 282, b. Her pride and cruelty animates him, 289, d, e, 291, e. Dies in her way to Italy, 292, d, e.

the widow of Mauritius, racked and executed, 537, f, & feq.
the city of, converted, 265, c.

Constantine, the family of, 186, b, 226, e, f.

the emperor, born, 226, c. Speech on Divelefian's refignation, 218, 2. Intercedes for the christians, ibid. f. Censure of Porphyry, 224, sub not. When and where born, 227, b, c, d, e. His excellent character, 230, b, c, d. Why deposed by Galerius, 231, a, b, c. In great danger of him, ibid. d, e. His extraordinary valour, ibid. fe

Over-reaches him, 232, b. Joins his father in Gaul, ibid. c, d. Proclaimed emperor, ibid. & feq. Severity against the Franks, 233, f, & seq. Bridge over the Rhine, 234, b, c. Allies with Maximian, 235, b. His progeny by Fausta, ibid. c. Acknowledged by Galerius, 237, b, c. Betrayed by Maximian, ibid. e, f. Clemency to him, 238, 2. Puts him to death, 239, a. Stratagem against the Alemani, ibid. d, c. Surnamed Maximus for it, ibid. c. Marches against Maxentius, 242, d, e. His miraculous conversion, 243, b, c. Cyphers and cross, ibid. d, &c. Instructed in the christian religion, 244, b, c. His coin, how impressed, ibid. e, f. Crosses the Alps against Mamarches to Rome, ibid. f, & feq. His fingular dream, 246, b. Signal victory, ibid. d, e. Reception at Rome, ibid. f. Midnefs to the Maxentians, 247, a, b. Edict against informers, ibid. c. In favour of the senate, ibid. d. His arch and other triumphal honours, ibid. e. Christian piety, ibid. & feq. Stops the perfecution, 148,2. Donative to the church, ibid. & feq. Cycle called indiction, 249, c. Success against the Franks, 250, f. Takes the title of Francicus, 251, b. Rescript in favour of the clergy, ibid. & seq. Against schismatics, 252, a, b. Falls out with Licinius, 254, c, d. Defeats him, ibid. e. Makes peace with him, ibid. e, f. His laws in Greece, 255, a, 256, paff. & alib. Defeats the Sarmatians, 257, a, 250, patt. & altb. Deteats the Sarmasians, 257, a. Signal victory over Licinius, ibid. & feq. Purfues him into Asia, 258, c, d. Grants him a new peace, ibid. e, f. Defeats and puts him to death, 259, a, b. Edict in favour of the christians, ibid. f. Against idolatry, 260, b, c. Shuts up the heathen temples, ibid. d. Banishes fome heretics, ibid. e. Edicts at Nicomedia, ibid. & seq. Lastifed at Rame. 261 h. Severity to Cristus. Infulted at Rome, 261, b. Severity to Crifpus, ibid. c. And others, ibid. d, e. Fatal to his whole family, 262, a. Bridge over the Danube, ibid. c. Success against the Goths, ibid. d. e. Favours the Arians, ibid. e. Largesses to Constantinople, ibid. & seq. Defeats the Goths, 264, b. And Sarmatians, ibid. c. Generosity to Antiech and other cities, ibid. d. e. Farbossies from all and other cities, ibid. d, e. Embassies from all the east, ibid. & seq. Translation of the holy scriptures, 265, c. Pareiality to the Arians, ibid. acriptures, 265, c. Partiality to the Arians, ibid. & feq. Division of the empire, 266, a, b. Wars against the Persuns, ibid. & feq. Last sickness, 267, a. By whom baptized, ibid. b. Death, ibid. d. Last will put into bad hands, ibid. e. Funeral pomp, ibid. & feq. Stately mausoleum, 268, b, c. And high encomiums, ibid. & feq. Character vindicated, 269, & feq. Wholsome regulations, 270, & feq. Writings, 271, (F). Final end of his family, 275, a. of his family, 275, a.

Constantine II. his son, born, 235, c. Created Cafar, 255, e. His share of the empire, 266, 2. Proclaimed emperor, 273, & seq. Takes the title of Augustus, 275, a. Invades Constans, 276, c. Defeated and killed, ibid. d. His character, ibid. &

- III. chosen emperor in Britain, 454, b. Success in Gaul, ibid. c, d, &c. In Spain, 455, c, d.
Acknowledged by Honorius, ibid. e. Invades Italy, 465, c. Driven back, ibid. d. Besieged in Arles, 466, e. Surrenders to Constantius, 467, a. Beheaded, ibid. b.

- IV. the son of Heraclius, created Casar, 540, a. Meets his father's triumph, 542, b, c. Crowned and poisoned, 544, b, c.

V. the son of Constant II. proclaimed emperor, 545, e. Why furnamed Pogonatus, ibid. f. Jealous of his two brothers, ibid. & feq. Makes peace with Mahuvias, 546, c, d. With the Bulgarians, ibid. e. Calls a council, ibid. His death,

- VI. Copronymus born, 551, e. Why fo VOL VI. Nº 12.

called, ibid. f. Proclaimed, 552, a. Marries Irene, 554, b. Crowned, ibid. c. Deposed by his brother-in-law, ibid. d, e. His revenge on him, ibid. e, t. Success against the Saracens, ibid. & seq. Diverted from his pursuit by public calamities, 555, b, c. Invaded by the Bulgarians, ibid. c, d. Persecutions against image-worshippers and friers, ibid. Defeats the Bulgarians, 556, a. Outwitted by their king, ibid. b, c. His death and charac-cy their king, ibid. b, c. His death and character, ibid, & feq.

Constantine VII. the son of Leo III. by Irene, created his collegue, 556, e. Crowned, 557, b. Why surnamed Porphyrogenitus, ibid. c. Conspired against, ibid. Falls out with his mother, ibid. e, f. Consined by her, 558, a, b. Restored and def. Confined by her, 558, a, b. Restored, and deprives her, ibid. c. Success against the Bulgarians, ibid. c, d. Cruelty to Nicephorus and his friends, ibid.e. To the mutinous Armenians, ibid. f, & seq. Divorces Mary, and marries Theodota, 559, a. Noble answer to Cardames, ibid. b. Put to flight by him, ibid. c. Put to death, ibid. e.

VIII. the fon of Michael, made Cafar, 573,

His death, ibid. e.

IX. the fon of Leo, born, 575, c. Left under his uncle's care, 577, a, b. Kept under by Romanus, 579, & feq. Refumes his power, 580, e. Severity to Romanus's family, ibid. f. His death, 581, f.

X. the brother of Basilius, made his collegue of the bid.

legue, 585, b. Reigns sole emperor after his death, 593. His wicked reign, ibid. & feq. Death, 594, b.

XI. Monomachus, marries Zoe, 597, f, & feq. Crowned, 598, a. Success against the Saracens, ibid. b. Against the Turks, 600, pass. death, 601, 2.

fatal avarice and death, ibid. & feq.

the fon of Michael, fuffered to wear the purple robe, 609.

- XII. Paleologus. Vide fub Paleologus, 649,

Astilius's general, cut off in Afric, 461, d. the fon of Andronicus, his narrow escape 576, d. Leo's timely warning to him, ibid. e. His treason and death, 578, b.

- the favourite of Leo, made high chamberlain, 576, e, f. Swears the Romans before the holy crofs, 578. Poifoned by Romanus, 581, d. His character, ibid. & feq. the fon of Andronicus Paleologus, fent against his rebellious grandson, 639, d. Over-reached and kept prisoner by him ibid a f.

and kept prisoner by him, ibid. e, f.

Constantine's square burnt, 519.
Constantine's square burnt, 519.
Constantine's square burnt, 519.
Constantine, when begun, 262, d. Dedicated, ibid.
e. Why built by Constantine, ibid. & seq. How adorned, 263, b, c, d. Consecrated, ibid. e. Governed, ibid. f, 305, e. Beautified by Constantins, 215, e, f. By fulian, 327, b. In danger from the Goths, 433, d, e. Threatened by a fiery sky, 437, e. Shattered by an earthquake, 447, e. The great church of it burnt, 451. In an uproar for want of corn, 463, a, b. Surrounded with new walls, 469, c. Burnt by a three days fire, 402, f. Damaged by an earthquake, 489, b. By a six days fire, 508, b. City and library burnt, 515, c. In a tumult through various factions, 525, f. 30,000 persons killed in it, 526, b, c. Laid waste by a pestilence, and the Hunns, 529, pass. Besieged by the Saracens, 546, b. Surprised by Justinian, 549, a. Taken by Theodossus, 550, e. Brave desence against the Saracens, 551, b, c. Damaged by an earthquake, 554, c. Taken Constantine's square burnt, 519. 550, e. Brave defence against the Saracens, 551, b, c. Damaged by an earthquake, 554, c. Taken and plundered, ibid. e, f. Both seas of it frozen, 555, e. Damaged by a great fire, 558, b. And earthquake, ibid. c. Plundered and ravaged, 608, e, f. Befreged by Alexius, 625, e, f. Set on fire, 626, d. Belieged by the Latins, 627, b, o. Taken and plundered, ibid. e, f. Retaken by the Greeks, 633, d, e. Rebuilt, 634, a, b. Besieged by Ba-jazet, 646, f, & seq. Relieved, 647, c, d. Blocked up by Mohammed II. 649, & feq. Besieged, 650, d. Taken and put to the sword, 653, d. Becomes the metropolis of the Turkish empire, ibid.

Constans, the son of Constantine, born, 235, c. Created Casar, 259, e, 264, d. His share of the empire, 266, a. Proclaimed, 274, a. Takes the title of Augustus, 275, a. Defeats and kills his brother Constantine, 276, c, d. Marches against the Franks, ibid. e, f. And Scots, 277, b. Zeal for the orthodox, 278, a. Murdered, 280, d. His character, ibid. & feq. Vindicated, 281, a.

the fon of the British Constantine, made Cafar, 455, c. Conquers Spain, ibid. d. Declared Augustus, ibid. Driven out of Spain, 462, e. Chosen consul, 469, c. Married to Placidia, 472, b,

The grandson of Heraclius, crowned, 544, c.
The disasters of his reign, ibid. d, e. Promotes Defeated at sea, ibid. f. Monothelism, ibid. c. Marches against the Sclavi, ibid. & seq. Makes peace with the Saracens, 545, a. Murders his brother, ibid. b. His melancholy state since, ibid. Successless expedition against the Lombards, ibid. e, d. Extortions and death, ibid. d, e.

Constantius Chlorus chosen Cafar by Maximian, 209, e. Adopted by him, ibid. f. His share of the empire, 210, a, b. Success in Gaul, 211, b, c. Buildings and works there, ibid. e, f. Sails into Britain, 212, b, c. Up the Thames, ibid. e. Success against the Alemani, 215, d. Declared emperor, 218, d. His extract, 224, a. Rise and character, 225, 2, b, c. Generous way of raising money, ibid. e, f. Protects the christians, 226, b, c. Turns away the apostates, ibid. d, e. His share of the empire, 231, c. Success against the Britons, 232, His death and obsequies, ibid. & seq.

the first wearer of a diadem, 279. a.

the son of Constantine, 235, c, 256, a. His share of the empire, 266, a. Married to his uncle's daughter, ibid. e. Made executor to his father, 267, d. Performs his obsequies, 268, b, c. Proclaimed emperor, 274, a. And Augustus, 275, a. Whether the murderer of his relations, ibid. b, c. Wars with the Armenians, 276, a, b, c. Yields Constantine's share to Constans, ibid. e, f. Triumphs over the Perfiant, 277, c. Marches against Maxentius, 282, b, c, d. Artful speech to his army, ibid. e. Success against him, 283, e, & feq. Pity and clemency to the enemy, 285, b. Enters Italy, ibid. & feq. Affection for Eufebia, 286, c. Success against Magnentius, 287, e, f. Clemency to the revolted, 288, b. Contradicted by other authors, ibid. c, d, & feq. Hates the orshodox, 289, b. Marches against the Alemans, 290, c, d. Makes peace with them, and enters Italy, ibid. e, f. His design against Gallus fruftrated, 291, b, c, d. Invites him into Italy, 292, b, c. Puts him to death, 293, c, d. His abominable pride, ibid. f. Success against the Germans, 294, c, d. Directions to Julian when made Cafar, 297, 2. Success in Rhatia, ibid. & seq. Grand entry and honours at Rome, 293, a, b. Marches into the north, ibid. e, f, & feq. Takes the honour of Julian's victories, 301, e, f. Anthe honour of Julian's victories, 301, e, f. An-fwer to Sapor's haughty letter, 302, f, & feq. Regard for Conflantinople, ibid. d, e. Success and cruelties against the Sarnatians, 303, 305. Marches against Sapor, 308, c, d. Policy against Julian, ibid. & feq. Threatening message to him, 311, d, e, f. Stirs up the Germans against him, 312, e, f. Marries Fauftina, 314, a. His death, ibid. d. Baptifm, ibid. f. Charefter, ibid. & feg. Library at Constantinople, 315, c.

Conflantius Julius, the fon of Chlorus, his death, the brother of Conflantine, 266, e. Created patrician, 171, f, & seq. Murdered by the foldiers, 275, a.

general of Theodofius, fent against Constantine. 466, b. His extract and character, ibid. c. Success, ibid. d. Chosen consul, 469, c. Deseats Athulpius's offers, 470, b. Raised to the imperial dignity by Honorius, 473, d. His death, ibid. e.

Conftostephanus sent to intercept Bohemond, 616, e. Consulars among the Romans, their office, 271, b, c. Consulate shortened to three months, 10, b.

Consulhip, reckoning by, abolished, 526, d. Restored by Justin II. ibid. e.

Cooks reduced by Julian, 325, e.

Coptos destroyed, 213.

Corcyra taken by Manuel, 619, e.

Cordus El. Jun. character and writings, 165, sub

Corelia, Pliny's generofity to, 29, fub not.

Corinth burnt by the Heruli, 184, d. Damaged by an earthquake, 523, f. Great rejoicings at Timoleon's victory, 785, c, d. Corinebians fend Timoleon to relieve Syracuse, 775, a, b, c, d. Their noble defence of its citadel, 779, c, d. Take Acradina, ibid. f.

Cornelia Jul. Paula, married to Heliogabalus, 135, a. Her excellent character, ibid. b.

Correctors among the Romans, their office, 271, b, Corfica, when invaded by the Carthaginians, 731, a, b. Described, ibid. c. Reduced by Scipio, 833.

Corvus, a warlike engine, described, 831, (M). Whether differing from the manus ferrea, ibid.

Corybantes among the Phanicians, who, 694, b. Cos overturned by an earthquake, 59, a. Repaired by Antoninus, ibid. b.

Cosrboes invaded by Trajan, 16, e, f. Forced to fubmit, 19, b. Slips away, 21, a. His golden throne seized by Trajan, ibid. b. Recalled by Adrian, 33, d.

invades Syria, 526, e, f. Destroys Antioch. ibid. f. Makes peace with Justinian, 527, b. Treachery to him, ibid. c. Marches against Belissarius, ibid. e. Repulsed by him, ibid. f. Refore Edessa, 528, a. Truce with the Romans, ibid. f. Sues for peace, 529, c. Renews the war, 532, b, c. Takes Duras, ibid. d. New truce made and broken, ibid. f, & seq. Defeated, and breaks his heart, 533, a, b.

the fon of Hormifdas, forced to depose his father, 535, c. Driven from his kingdom, ibid. d. Restored by Mauritius, ibid. e. Takes up arms against Phocas, 537, c. Success and devastations in Syria, 538, b, c. In Cappadocia, &c. 539, d. Egypt and Palestine, ibid. e. Blasphemous answer to Heraclius, 540, a. Defeated by him, ibid. & feq. Persecutes the christians in revenge, 541, c. Flees to Seleucia, ibid. f. Deposed and murdered, 542, a, b.

Coffa, why forfaken by its inhabitants, 477, fub not. Coffyra, island, described, 671, (E).

Cothen, one of the three parts of Carthage, 662, b.

Its etymon, ibid. & seq. Council of Arles, 254, 2,b. Of Nice, 260, e. Of Tyre, 265, e. Of Ferufalem, ibid f. Of Sardica, 277, e. Second of Arles, 289, b. Of Milan, 294, b. Second of Conftantinople, 395, f. Of Bpbesus, 482, c. Of Chalcedon, 498, a. Third of Constantinople, 546, e. Second of Nice, 560, e, 570, e, f. Of Clermont

Of Florence unites the Greek and Latin churches, 649, a, b.

Count, whence derived, 172, b.

Coufin-germans forbid to intermarry, 404, c, d.
That law whon put into the code, ibid. e.

Craffus's conspiracy against Nerva, 4, f. Banished,

- against Trajan, 16, c. Banished and put to death, 91, e.

Craterus defeated in Crete, 566, e, f. Crucified, 567, a. Grates's kind reception of Cantacuzenus, 644, c. Falls out with him, 645, b.

Crescentius, a lewd Cynic philosopher, 81, (H) Crete damaged by an earthquake, 366, c. Whence called Candia, 566, d. Recovered by the Romans, Criminals condemned to the mines, 261, a. Released at the feast of Easter, 395, b. Condemned to death, respited for thirty days, 396, d, e.

Crispina married to Commodus, 80, a. Banished and murdered, 88, a.

Crispinus Tullius made przetor of the guards, 100, f. Sent to assassinate Severus, 106, a. Cut in pieces, ibid. b.

noble defence of Aquileia, 158, f. Crispus, the father of Claudia, 186, b.

the fon of Conflantine, born, 230, e. Created Casar, 155, e. His character, 256, a. Defeats the Franks, ibid. E. And Licinius at sea, 258, c, d. Falily accused by Fausta; 261, b. Put to death, ibid. c.

general of Heraclius, his ill success against the Perfians, 539, d, e.

Crocus defeated by Conflations, 232, d.
Crafus's treasure found and carried off by Heraclius, 540, f.

Crones's writings and character, 83, fub not.

Reco

Cross seen by Constantine, 243, b, c. Becomes the Roman standard, ibid. d, e, & seq Stamped on the shields and helmets, 246, b. Set up in the Sessian church, 248, f. The sign of life among the Egyptians, 417, d. Part of Christ's cross carried off by the Persians, 539, e. Restored and brought back to Heraclius, 542, b. To Jerusalem, ibid. e. Several sorts of crosses used by the Forws, &c. 726, f.

Crucifixion forbid by Conflantine, 255, a. An account of that punishment, 726, (F). Inflicted at Carthage on the noblest persons, ibid. ad fin.

Crumus's fuccess and indignities against Nicepborus, 562, b, c. Defeated by Leo, 563, e, f.

Crusade, or holy war, the beginning of, 613, & seq.

Cresiphon taken by Trajan, 21, a. By Cassius, 65, c.

By Severus, 114, b. Its dreadful sate, ibid. c. Closely besieged by Odenatus, 178, e, d. By Carus, 204, e.

Culcianus put to death, 253, d.

Curiosi at court, who, 325, e. Reduced, ibid. s. Curizer's rashness and defeat, 524, d.

Curubis, where situate, 667, b, c.

Cutlumoses's ill success against the Arabians, 599, b.
Revolts against Tangrolipix, 606, d. Makes a treaty with his son Azan, ibid. e. Wats against the Romans, ibid. & feq.

Cybele, the statue of, carried to the temple of Eleagabalus, 136, e.

- the temple of, inriched by Julian, 527, b. Cylax made governor of Armenia, 373, a. Betrays the Perfians, ibid. b.

Syneas fent into Sicily by Pyrrhus, 814, b.

Cynegus fent to proclaim Maximus, 402, b. Ordered to suppress idolatry, 404, a, b. His death and character, ibid. b, c.

decrees the holy war, 613, f. Of Lyons, 635, e, f. Cynic philosopher's speech to Commodus, 88, f. Burnt alive for it, 89, a.

Cyprian women profitute themselves for a dowry,

Cyprus, 250,000 Jews revolt at, 23, d. All de-ftroyed, ibid. f. Their embassadors over-reached by the Philani, 737, c, d.

Cyriades's character, 174, b. Assumes the purple in the east, ibid. e.

Cyril St. falls out with Orestes, 471, b, c. governor of Thrace, taken prisoner by Vitalianus, 522, a.

Cyrillus Statius, his writings and character, 222, a. Cyrnus, the Greek name of Corfica, 731, b, c.

Cyrus's rife and character, 486, c, d.

- bishop of Alexandria, saves Egypt by a tribute, 543, d, e.

Cyzicus plundered by the Heruli, 184, pass. Taken by Procopius, 367, d. Part of, overturned by an earthquake, 506, c.

D.

Acia seized by the Goths, 183, 2. Rejoined to the empire, 204, a

New, by whom founded, 195, a. Part of, yielded to Theodoric, 516, a.

Dacians war with Trajan, 11, d. Ravaged by him, 12, a, b, 14, d. Subdued, 15, b. Defeated by Aurelius, 66, f. By Decius, 169, d. Ravaged by the Quadi, ibid. & seq.

Dadastana, where situate, 345, d.

Dagalaiphus promotes Valentinian's election, 346, c. Noble answer to him, 348, c. Success against the Germans, 350, c, d. Chosen consul, ibid. d. Treachers in Germany, 351, 2.

Dagistones sent against Petra, 528, b. Cowardly flight, ibid. c.

Dagobert's embasily to Heraclius, 542, f. Daja. Vide Maximin, 218, & seq.

Dalmatia destroyed by the Quadi, 388, c. By the Goths, 433, d, e. Made a new empire, 507, b. Dalmatius, the son of Constantius, 226, e. His death, his son born, 226, f. Created Casar, 266,

a. Murdered by the foldiers, 275, a.

Damaretia, a Sicilian coin, whence so called, 735, d, e, (C).

Damascus taken by the Saracens, 543, d. Damianus defeated and killed, 566, d.

Damophilus's writings and character, 83, sub not. Dandalo Henry, his fingular bravery, 626, 2.

Danube, the famous bridge over, described, 14, b, c. Daphne's temple at Rome burnt, 327, b.

- a suburb of Antioch, infamous to a proverb, 76, c. Oppressed by Proculus, 403, b. Daphneus's success against the Carthaginians, 747, & feq. Starves them, 748, a, b.

Daphnomelus's desperate attempt on Ibatzes, 592, d.

Rewarded, ibid. f.

Daras, where fited, 521, d. Fortified, ibid. Taken by Cofrhoes, 532, d. Dardanus, prefect of Gaul, his motley character, 468, a, (O).

Darkness over the Roman empire, 426, b. A dreadful one under Constantine IV. 555, b.

Datianus, a promoter of Valentinian, 346, c.

Decebalus wars with the Romans, 11, d. Defeated, ibid. f. Sues for peace, 12, a, b. Revolts, 13, d.

Treachery, ibid. e. Subdued, 15, b. Kills himself, ibid. c. His vast treasures discovered, ibid.

Decentius created Cafar, 281, b, c. His birth and character, ibid. d. Defeated by the Franks, 282, d.

C

Ž.

ييج T

Chosen consul, 285, c. Repulsed before Treves, ibid. f. Hangs himself, 288, 2.

Decentius sent to bring part of Julian's forces, 308, f. His satal imprudence, 309, c, d. Decimus succeeds Vulpianus, 139, e. Decius Tre. succeeds the brave Castinus, 132, c. Put to death by Heliogabalus, 136, a. the emperor, fent governor of Masia, 167, Forced to accept the empire, ibid. c. Kills Philip, ibid. Proclaimed and acknowledged, 168, Grievous persecution of the christians, ibid. b, c, d. Success against the Goths, 169, c, d, 170, a, b. Betrayed by Gallus, ibid. c. His death and character, ibid. d. his fon defeats the Goths, 168, b, 169, b. Cut off by them, ibid. c. When called Augustus, ibid. d. His bravery and death, 170, b.

treachery to Rhegium, 817, & seq. Punishment, 821, past. Delassenus Constant, sent into banishment, 595, f. Deleanus choien chief of the revolted Bulgarians, 596, e. Treachery to Teichomerus, 597, a. His reward, ibid. b, c. Delphidius's writings and character, 316, (G). Delphinus defeated by Basilius, 591, t. Demaratus's valour against the Carthaginians, 782, b, 783, b. Demetrius Alexand. a disciple of Favorinus, 49, sub not. Beloved by Adrian, 50, sub not.

Cythras tortured for idolatry, 305, 2.

high treasurer to Honorius, 460, c. Demon or genius of Carthage worshipped there, 693, d. Demonax a Cynic philosopher's excellent character, 82, sub not. Noble answer to the Athenians, ibid. And to M. Aurelius, ibid. Demophilus chosen bishop of Constantinople, 371, f. an Arian bishop, deposed, 395, a. Demosthenes defeated by Sapor, 177, 2.

Dengizic, the Hunn, flain, 508, c.

Desiderius created Casar by his brother, 281, b.

Murdered by him, 287, e. Said to have submitted to Conftantius, 288, a. Deusona, the treacherous fight of, 3,56, a, b: Deuterus tortured to death, 456, d. Dexippus's victory over the Heruli, 184, d. - writings and character, 197, fub not-- brave defence of Agrigentum, 746, b, &c. Justly blamed for indiscretion, 747, e, f. Diadem first worn by Aurelian, 196, b. Diadumenus, the fon of Macrinus, 128, c, 130, b. Created Cafar, ibid. d, e. Surnamed Antoninus, ibid. f. Mild character, 131, f, & seq. Supposed letter to his father, 132, b, (P). Made partner of the empire, 133, d. His flight and death, 134, 2. Diana's temple at Ephesus plundered by the Scythians, 180, d. Her worship at Carthage, 686, past. Dido, the time of her coming to Carthage, 658, a, 659, b. Whether she founded it, 658, d, e, 659, a. Worshipped there, 692, b, c. Her flight from Tyre, 719, e. Settles in Afric, 721, pass. Her death, &c 722, & scq. Didymus driven out of Spain, 455, c. Put to death, ibid. d, e. Die in Dauphine subject to the Burgundians, 504, b. Digesta of Justinian, when and by whom compiled, Dinocrates repulsed before Centuripe, 791, (E). Diocasarea burnt by Gallus, 286, b. Dioces, what, 379, b. Dioclea, the mother of Dioclesian, 206, a. Diocles put to death by Valentinian, 353, f. noble defence of Himera, 743, b, &c. Goes to succour Syracuse, 744, b, c, d. Dioclesan ocra, what, 206, f. Dioclesian proclaimed, 205, c. His rise and character, ibid. & ieq. Runs Aper through, 206, d. Suc-cels against Carbous, 207, a. In Gaul, &c. ibid. b, &c. Against the Persians, ibid. f, & seq. In Germany, 208, e. Against the Sarmatians, 209, Interview with Maximian, ibid. b. Fatal division of the empire, 210, a, b, c. Goes into Thrace, 211, f. Cruel success in Egypt, 213, b, c. Alliance with the Nubians, ibid. e. Contempt of Galerius, 214, c. Castles on the Persian frontiers, 215, c. Brings a famine by his avarice, ibid. f. & feq. Persecutes the christians, 216, b, c, d. Lives in terrors from that time, ibid. e, f. Cruelty to Antioch, Seleucia, &c. 217, b. Triumphs with his three collegues, ibid. c. His tedious illness, ibid. c, d. Resigns to Galerius, ibid. e, f. Speech to the people upon it, 218, b. Retired life, ibid. c, d. Palace at Spalato, ibid. e. Death and character, 219, a, b, c, 250, e. Baths and other public buildings, ibid. d, e, f. Cruelty and vanity, 220, a, b. His hiftory, whence imperfect, ibid. c. The first wearer of pearls, 269, 2. Dioderus bishop of Tarfus, his confutation of Perphyry, 223, fub not. Diogenes Laertius's writings and character, 121, sub governor of Bisbynia, put to death, 374. Anastasius's general, closely shut up in Isanria, 519, c. Relieved by crookback'd John, ibid.

Romanus raised to the empire, 604, pass. Success against the Turks, ibid. e, f. Deseated and taken prisoner, 605, c, d. Kindly received and released by the sultan, ibid.e, f. Deseated by 40dronicus, 606, a. His miserable end, ibid. b.

Diogenes's writings and character, 51, fub not. Diomedes's writings and character, 478, fub not. Dion Cassius's account of Arian, 49, sub not. Life of Antoninus lost, 55, c. Made governor of Smyrna, 132, 2. Consulship and honours under Alex. Severus, 140, c, d. Retirement, ibid. Account of the Roman legions at that time, ibid. e, f. His other writings, 149, fub not.

Chrysostom's writings and character, 149, fub not.

Dionotus, king of Cornwall, supplies Cenon with women, 400, f. The story consuted, ibid. &

Dionysius of Halicarnassus, his writings and character, 51, fub not. Why furnamed Atticift, ibid. - Papyrius brings on a famine in Rome, 90, f.

Put to death, 91, d.

the first, created count, 272, a. tyrant of Syracuse, sent generalissimo against Hamilear, 750, a, 751, a. Deseated by him, ibid. c. Makes peace, 752, f. & feq. Commences tyrant of Syracufe, 753, & feq. Breaks the peace with Carthage, 734, a, b. Fortifies himself, ibid. & seq. Repulsed before Motyas, 757, d. Cruelty to the Greeks and Motyans, 758, c, d. Repulsed before Egesta, 759, b. Marches against the Car-thaginians, 761, d. Deseated at sea, 762, d. Returns to Syracuse, 763, b, c. Deseats Hamileo, 766, b, c. Suffers him to march off, 767, b, c, Success against Mago, 769, & seq. with him, 770, d, e. Descent into Etruria, 771, a. Breaks with the Carthaginians, ibid. b, &c. Defeats them, ibid. & feq. Truce with them, 772, a. Defeated by young Mago, ibid. b, c. Invades the Carthaginians afresh, 773, d. Dies, ibid. c.

II. makes peace with Carthage, 774, c, d. Defeated by Icetas, 776, c, 778, paff. Diaspolis burnt by Gallus, 286, b. Distagerda, the Roman standards, &c. released from, 541, f.
Dobbius, the murderer of Ataulphus, 470, e.

Dodwell's sentiment about Adrian's adoption examined, 26, a, b, 46, (C).

Dogs flesh eaten by the Carthaginians, 705, b. Domeflics forbid to impeach their masters, 439, c.

Domitia married to Priscus, 537, f.

Domitian's jealousy of Nerva, 2, c. Death, ibid. e. - prefect of the east, succeeds Thalassus, 291, b. His ill conduct towards Pallas, ibid. d. Miserable end, ibid. e.

Donatists suppressed by Constantine, 252, a, b. By the council of Arles, 254, a, b. In Africa, 278, b. Court the revolted Firmus, 359, c. Suppressed by Gratian, 379, b, 389, b. Favoured by Honorius, 460, d.

Donatus's writings and character, 316, & seq. sub not.

Dorotheus's fuccess against the Persians, 724, e. Doryphorianus put to death for extortion, 377, f. Dracontia, island, 672, sub not. 6.

Drepanius Pacatus's panegyric on Theodofius, 415, e. Drepanum, whence called Helenopolis, 262, b. lieved by Carthalo, 843, c. Belieged by Fabius, 849, b.

Drilli, a fierce northern people, 41, a.

Druid woman's threatening speech to Alexander, promises the empire to Diocles, 206, a. Fulfilled, ibid. d, e.

Druncianus, son-in-law to Cassius, promoted by M.

Aurelius, 771, d.

Ducas John fets his nephew on the throne, 605, f.
Governs him, 606, a, b. Taken prisoner by Rufelius, ibid. c. By sultan Azan, ibid. d. Inveteracy against Boloniates, 609, a.

Success against the Turks, 611, f, & seq.

Makes peace with Tzachas, 612. Defeats him,

Murtzuphius's treachery to Alexius III. 626, f, & feq. Proclaimed emperor, 627, a, b.
Wars with Henry the Latin emperor, 629, & feq.

Vataces succeeds Lascaris, 630, b. Succes-

- Vataces succeeds Lascaris, 630, b. ses against the Latins, ibid. c. Allies with Azem, ibid. d. Ravages Thrace, 631, c. His death, ibid. f.

account of the taking of Constantinople, 652, & seq.

Duces, their office, 271, e.

Duilius's columna rostrata explained, 660, (D).

the Roman consul, repulsed before Mytti-firatum, 830, b. Forced to command the fleet, ibid. c. Defeats the Carthaginians, 831, c, d. Duras overturned by an earthquake, 277, d. Taken by the Ostrogoths, 515, e. Abandoned by them, Dynamenes's treachery to Sylvanus, 294, f. To Malaricus, 295, b, c.

Dyrrhachium revolts, 596, f. Attempted by Guiscard. 609, f. Taken, 610, f. Relinquished by his son, 611, c, d. Opens to young Alexius, 625, e. Dyscoles. Vide Apollonius, 84, sub not.

E.

Arthquake in Asia, destroys several cities, 14, e. In Galatia, 19, f. At Antioch, a dire one, described, 21, c, d. Under Gallienus, 180, b. A dreadful one under Constant, 276, f. Another in Pontus and Campania, 277, c, d. Destroys A dreadful one under Conjums, 270, f. Attorner in Pontus and Campania, 277, c, d. Destroys 150 cities, 304, c. Dismal one under Julian, 328, a. Under Valens, 366, b, c. Under the same, 371, a. Under Theodosius, 426, b. In the east under Arcadius, 437, c. Under Theodosius, 489, a, b. At Antioch, 506, a. At Cyzicus, ibid. c. At Neocesarea, 520, b. At Antioch, &c. 523, f. Under Justinian, 529, c. At Antioch, 534, f, & feq. At Constantinople, 554, c. A dreadful one under Constantine IV. 555, b. Under Michael Balbus, 567, 2. Under Romanus II. 595, b, c, 596, c. Under Ducas, 603, e.

Vol. VI. Nº 12.

Easter, the time of, settled by Gratian, 397, 2. Criminals released on that festival, 408, a.

Ebesus, Eresus, colonied by the Carchaginians, 729, e. Where sited, ibid. f.

Ecclefiastics, their immunities. See Clergy, 248, & ſeq.

Ecdices's treachery and reward, 466, f.

Eclectus high chamberlain to Commodus, 88, b. Doomed to death by him, 93, b, c. Conspires against him, ibid. e, f. Dies in defence of Persinax, 99, a.

Eclipses frightful to the Sicilians, 793, & seq. Edecom hired to assassinate Attila, 490, b.
Edessa taken and burnt by the Romans, 24, b. By Cassus, 65, c. Made a Roman colony, 127, b. Sells dear her passage to Sapor, 178, b. Forgiven by Confiantius, 316, a. Taken by Costhoes II. 539, c. Narrow escape from the Saracens, 596, d, e.

Edessans, their prayer against Alaric, 449, c. Edictum perpetuum, when and by whom first published, 37, c.

Edobicus succours Constantine, 466, c. Killed by Ecdices, ibid. f.

Egestines invite the Carthaginians against the Selinuntines, 737, f, & feq. Bravery against the Syracufians, 759, a, b.

Eggius Merulus's consulship, 88, e.

Eleagabalus. Vide Heliogabalus, 132, & seq.

- the temple of, 136, d, e. Eleasina damaged by an overflow of the Cephisus, 35, fi - the pontiff of, his magic practices with fu-lian, 323, 2.

Elephants long dreaded by the Romans, 844, 2.

Brought, with Indian leaders, out of India, ibid.

When first used by the Carthaginians, 856, (G).

Eleric's stratagem to find out his treacherous sub-jects, 556, b. Turns christian, and abdicates, ibid.

Blias, the Bosporan king, defeats and kills Justinian,

549, f.

Elija, the same with Dido, 659, a. The etymon of her names, 722, a, (D). Whether cotemporary with Aneas, 723, d, e. The rest see under Dido, 658, & feq.

Ellobicus sent to try the Antiochians, 409, b. His severity to them, ibid. d, e, f. Softened by some good christians, 400, d.

- fucceeds Vigilantius, 460, d.

Elpidius preserves Symmachus's writings, 428, sab

Elymas assists Agathocles, 800, b. Turns tail, and defeated by him, ibid. c, d.

Emessa, the cathedral of, built by Constantius, 316, b. Emessans kill young Quietus, 180, e. Put to the fword, ibid. f. Surrender to Aurelian, 190, d, e. Empedocles's famed faying concerning the Agrigen-tines, 749, c. Emporium taken by Hannibal, 741, 2.

Encella taken by Dionysius, 773, d. By Timoleon, 781, d.

Encratites, Manichees, whence so called, 397, a. Endortes, a Celtic general, taken, and crucified, 866, Enna taken by the Agrigentines, 802, (P). milcar, 832, c. Betrayed to the Romans, 833, d.

Eoric, the Alan, settles on the Loire, 485, c Epagathus, a slave, his great sway with Caracalla, 125, b. Ephori of Sparta compared with the Carthaginian quinquevirate, 677, a, b, c, (H). Ephorus's writings and character, 185, (Y), 739, (E). Ephtolites, who, and where fited, 402, c. Befiege Edeffat, ibid. d. Epicterus, the famed philosopher, an account of, 50, fub not. 10 R Epipola fortified by Dionyfius, 754, b.

Epirus plundered by the Gauls, 435, e. Seized on by Michael Angelus, 629, e.

Equiso taken prisoner by the Gauls, 383, e. Escapes, and is fliin, 384, b.

Equitius, why fet afide from the empire, 346, b. Extortions in Illyricum, 350, d. Moderation to the Quadi, 361, d, e. Pursued by them, 362, b. c.

Erigenes, a copier of Macrobius, 477, sub not. Erix taken by Dionysius, 773, d. By Pyrrhus, 815, e. Taken and razed by Hamilcar, 832, c. By Hamilcar Barcas, 849, c.

Ermenric invaded by the Hunns, 379, d. Kills himfelf, ibid.

Ermeric king of the Suevians in Spain, 463, a. Vain attempt on Galicia, ibid. b. Driven out by Gonderic, 473, b, c. His treaty with the Galicians, Erna and his Hunns fettle in Scythia Minor, 496, d. Erucius C. Ju. acknowledges Pertinax emperor, 95, Etruscilla Herenn. the wife of Decius, 168, b. - daughter, married to Gallus, 170, c.

Esruscus the son of Decius, 168, b. His death, 170, d.

Evagrius's vain apology for Conflantine, 261, c. Choien bishop of Constantinople, 371, b.

Evasius burnt alive, 360, f. Eububezer succeeds Mohammed, 543. His conquests and death, ibid. &c. Eucherus, the fon of Stilicho, born, 43r, e. Vain threats against christianity, 456, e, f. Put to death, 4 : 7, a.

Eucolpius's writings and character, 148, (Q). Eudocia's extract and character, 473, e, f. Marriage with Theodosius, ibid. & seq. Excellent poems, with Theodosius, ibid. & seq. Excellent poems, 474, a, (Q). Declared Augusta. 479, b. Journey and largesses to Ferusalem, 485, a, b. Retirement, ibid. f, & seq. Death, buildings, &c. 486, b, c, d.

c. Married to Hunneric, ibid. d, & 507, c. - the wife of Heraclius, crowned, 539, b. Her delivery and death, ibid. d.

widow of Ducas, made regent, 603, f. Invaded by the Turks, 404, b. Forced to marry, ibid. c, d. Deposed and confined, 605, f, & seq.

Eudoxia married to Arcadius, her extract, &c. 432, f, & feq. Imperious and wicked fway, 445, b, c. Assumes masculine titles, 447, e. Gets St. Chryfoslom banished, 451, c. Dies in child-bed, ibid.

Licinia betrothed to Valentinian III. 479, c. Married to him, 483, e. Forced to marry Maximus, 500, e. Hatches his death, ibid. & seq. Carried away captive, 501, & feq. Sent back to Leo, 507, C.

Eudoxius, bishop, swears Valens to Arianism, 370, b. His death, 371, f.

Eugenius proclaimed emperor, 216, f. Killed at Antioch, 217, a.

- an eunuch, fides with Procopius, 366, e. Proud embassy to Theodosius, 422, b, c. Success against the Franks, 423, c, d. Restores paganism, ibid. d, e. Descated, 424, pass. Put to death, 425, 2.

the father of Themislius, his writings and character, 429, sub not.

- defeats the Scenites in Syria, 520, a. Enmachus's success in Afric, 808, & seq. Defeat there, 810, b.

Rumenius's flattery to Constantius, 212, f, & seq. Panegyric on Constantine, 238, c. Writings and character, 271, (F).

Emnapius's writings and character, 272, (F), 338, 430, sub not.

Eunomia, a great oratress, 272, (F).

Eunomians suppressed by Gratian, 389, 2. By Theodofiss, 396, a.

Eunuchs, the number of, regulated by Aurelian, 194, b. Privileges granted to by Constantius, 185, c. Excluded from being patricians, 488, f.

Evedius put to death by Caracalla, 122, b. Euphemia, Marcian's daughter, married to Anthemius, 493, c.

Euphemius's facrilege, 567, b. Treason, ibid.c. Death.

Euphrasius killed by an earthquake, 523, f.

Euphrosyna forced out of a monastery by Balbus, 567, b. Sent back by his fon, ibid. f.

Euric murders his brother, and mounts the Gothish throne, 508, b. Seizes some provinces in Gaul, 510, c. Makes peace, 512, c.

Eusebia married to Constantius, 286, b. Her character, ibid. c. Friendship to Julian and the Arians, ibid. d, & 366, c. Unnatural jealousy against Helena, 287, b. Barrenness and death, ibid. c. Journey to Rome, 298, c.

Eusebius of Nicomedia banished, 260, e: Recalled, 262, c. Impoles on Constantine, 265, c, f. His hypocrify, 267, c. Educates young Julian, 320, bishop of Casarea, his account of the Thundering legion, 72, c, d. Of Constantine's conver-fion, vindicated, 244, b, c. Speech on the holy sepulches, 265, c. Book on Easter, ibid. Character of Constantine, 270, a. Character and writings, 272, (F).

· Constantius's high chamberlain, quells a sedition in Gaul, 290, d. Works Gallus's fall, 293, b, d. The cruel judge of all his friends, ibid. & seq. Treachery to Ursicinus, 306, b, c, 307, & feq. Deputation to Julian, 324, d. Put to death, 325, b.

professor of eloquence, succeeds Proeseles, 338, fub not.

- brother-in-law to Constantius, fined and banished, 374, e.

- high chamberlain to Honorius, 460, c. - the author of Gainas's war, his poem loft, 478, fub not.

Eustatius banished by Constantine, 265, f.

- his writings and character, 517, (V). archbishop, his learned comment upon Homer, 620, d.

Entherns sent to clear Julian, 198, f.

Enthymius absolves the emperor of his unlawful marriage, 575, d, e.

Eutropia, the wife of Maximian, 207, d.

- daughter of Constantius, 226, c. Whether a christian, 244, e.

- the fifter of Constantine the Great, 281, d. Murdered, ibid. c.

Entropius's abridgment imperfect, 19, c. Character of Constantius, 226, b, c. Other writings and character, 386, fub not.

fent to confult the hermit John, 422, c. High sway with Arcadius, 432, f. Envied by Rufinus, 433, b, c. Succeeds him, 434, f. His extract and fad character, 435, 2. Envy against ssilicho, ibid. & feq. Treachery to Abundansius, 436, b, c. To Timafius, ibid. & feq. To Bar-436, b, c. To Timafius, ibid. & feq. 10 par-bus, 437, d. Stirs up Gildo to revolt, 438, c. His griping confulhip, 441, b Difowned by Honorius, ibid, d, e. Undermined by Gainas, 442, tected by St. Chry/ostom, ibid. & seq. Banished, 444, b, c. Beherded, ibid. d, e.

Entychians suppressed by Marcian, 501, e. Raise 2 tumult in Alexandria, 504, e. And a massacre at Constantinople, 521, f.

Emychianus, a buffoon, made conful, 136, f.

Enxine sea described by Arrian, 41, f, & seq. Frozen 20 days, 448, f.

Euzoius, an Arian bishop, baptizes Conflantius, 314, f.

Exidares resigns his crown to Trajan, 16, c, f, &

Exilaratus, duke of Naples, murdered, 553, b.

F.

Abia betrothed to M. Aurelius, 62, b. Supposed to have poisoned L. Verus, 68, a. Orefilla married to Gordianus, 156, b. Eudocia. Vide sub Eudocia, 539, b, & seq. Fabian martyred at Rom, 168, d. Fabilius's writings and character, 165, fab not. Fabius Hi/pan. banished for extortion, 10, f. - Marcellus's history loft, 19, c. the conful, befreges Drepanum, 848, b. Faction, blue, at Conflantinople, beaten by the green, 520, b. Fadilda, Aur. Antoninus's daughter, 53, a. Betrothed to Maximinus Cafar, 152, 2.

- L. Junia, married to Fabilius, 165, sub

Falco Q. Cos acknowledges Pertinax emperor, 95, d. Brave speech to him, 96, b. Proposed to the empire, 98, b. Forgiven, and retires, ibid. c.

Faramond, whether he had any sway over the Franks, 472, d. His extract, ibid.

Farnobius's petition to fettle in the Roman territories rejected, 380, e. Defeats some of their legions, 382, b, c.

Favorinus's pleasantry to Adrian, 31, b. An account of him and his works, 49, fub not. Sarcaim against the Athenians, ibid.

Fausta, the wife of Constantine, born, 207, d. Married to him, 235, b. Issue by him, ibid. c. Fidelity to him, 238, e. Delivered of a fon, 255, d. Treachery to Crispus, 261, c. Death, ibid. d, e.

Faustina Annia married to Antoninus Pius, 53, a. Created Augusta, 55, a. Her avarice checked by her husband, ibid. e. Death and lewd character, 57, c.

daughter of Antoninus, married to M. Aure-lius, 53, a, 57, b. Whether accessory to Cassius's treason, 75, f. Her two letters to the emperor about him, 76, (G). Death and undeferved honours, 78, d, e.

- Annia put to death by Commodus, 91, e. Annia married to Heliogabalus, 135, a. Murdered by him, ibid.

widow of Constantius, comes to join Procopius, 367, f.

Faustinian society of women founded by M. Aurelius, Faustinopolis, why so called, 79, 2. Faustinus executed for a jest, 364, c. Felicissimus's revolt and death, 194, d, e.

Ś ī æd,

į.

Felix, a faithless minister of young Gordian, 162, (V).

- a famed rhetorician, 478, sub not. - murdered by the soldiers, 481, e.

Festus Pomp. his writings and character, 317, sub not.
Made proconsul of Asia, 374, f. His cruelties there, 375, c, d.

Filii Augustorum among the Romans, what, 237, b. Fire worshipped by the Carthaginians, 692, a.

Firmicus Julius's writings and character, 318, sub

Firmilianus put to death, 253, d.
Firmius revolts in Egypt, 192, b. Taken, and executed, ibid. c, d. Firmus stirs up a revolt in Morea, 358, f, & seq. Sham submission, 359, e. Pardoned by Theodosius, 360, a. Revolts afresh, ibid. e, d. Sudden slight, ibid. e. Betrayed by Ignomen, 361, a. Strangles himfelf, ibid. b.

Fiftes, a strange kind of, caught, 510, c. Flacilla, the wife of Theodofius, her extract and character, 390, d, e. Death, &c. 406, e, f.

daughter of Arcadius, born, 439, d.
Flavia Titiana's character, 96, c. Discarded by Pertinax, ibid. d.

Flavianus, bishop, sent to intercede for the Antiochians, 411, c. Excellent speech to Theodofius, ibid. d, e. Succeeds in his fuit, ibid. & feq.

- guards the Alps against Theodosius, 423, e. Killed, ibid. f.

Flesh, human, fold publicly during the famine, 463,

Florence relieved by Stilicho, 452, & feq.
Florentius, a fwom enemy to Julian, 309, a, 323.
Runs away from him, 311, a. Confulfhip and flight, 313, d. Narrow escape from death, 325, c.

- another put to death by Julian, ibid. betrays Procopius to Valens, 363, b, c. Put to death for it, ibid. d.

Florianus, the brother of Tacitus, 198, f. Rejected from the consulship, 199, b. Assumes the purple, ibid. e. Murdered, ibid. f.

Florus Luc. an account of his writings, 52, fub not. Verses to and from Adrian, ibid.

- the son of Evasius, burnt alive, 360, f. the conful's fuccess in Sicily, 833, pass. Follis, the tax of, fally imputed to Constantine, 269, d. e.

Fortunatianus Curt. his writings and character, 165, fub not.

Francici, the festival of, whence, 234, c. Franks, who, 173, b. Defeated by Aurelian, ibid. c. Ravage Italy, 175, a. Invade Spain, 183, a. Go into Afric, ibid. b. Transplanted by Constantine, 211, c, 212, b, c. Defeated by him, 234, a, b. Over-reached and cut to pieces by him, 250, f. & seq. By Crispus, 256, e. Submit to Constant, 277, b. Defeated by Julian, 304, a, b. By Theodosius, 353, f. By Maximus, 413. Ravage Gaul, 468, c. Permitted to settle in it, ibid. d. Embrace christianity, ibid. Allowed to settle in Hungaria, 472, d. Defeated by Attila, 494, e. Waste Germany, 499, f. Settle along the Rhine, Fraomarius made king of the Bucinobantes, 358, a. Fravitus's fidelity to the Romans, 447, b, c. Confulship, 448, e. Repulses the Hunns, 449. Frederic, the Visigoth, slain, 507, d.

Barbarossa betrayed by Isaac Angelus, 623, Invades his territories, 624, a, b. Answer to his embassadors, ibid. c.

French affift Alexius III. 625, & seq. Besiege and take Constantinople, 627, d, e.

Friday ordered to be kept, 256, f.

- Good, criminals released on, 405, d.

Frigerid defeats the Romans, 382, c. Frigidum, river, where, 423, f. The battle of, ibid. & feq.

Fritigern leads the Goths into Thrace, 380, d. Falls foul on the Romans, 381, b, c. Defeated by Sebafian, 383, b, c Amuses Valens, ibid. d, e.

Fritigil converted to christianity, 438, a. Frontinus's treatise on aqueducts, 10, b. His writings and character, 27, (A).

Fronto's bold speech against Nerva, 5, a. Chosen consul, 10, b. His writings and character, 60, fub not.

- Saturn.'s bravery in Syria, 64, b, c. Frost, a terrible and long one in the east, 555, e. Frumarius wastes Lusstania, 506, c.

Frumentarii, their office, 219, c. Snppressed, ibid. Fulgen ius Planciades, an ignorant and trifling author, 478, sub not.

Fullofaudes killed in Britain, 353, c.

Fursa

Furca of the Romans, what, 726, (F).
Furius Celsus's success in Mauritania, 140, c. Furtius deposed for his fidelity, 63, b. Fuscus put to death by Adrian, 44, b. Dreadful with on him, ibid. c.

Abinius treacherously murdered, 361, e, f. Gades, when first founded, 730, a-Gadir, the Punic name of Cadiz, its etymon, 730, Gaiabomarus murdered by Caracalla, 126, c.

Gaieta, the port of, made by Ausonius, 56, c. Gainas, a Gaulish general, 424, a. Assassinates Rusinus, 434, d. Stirs up a revolt against Eutropius, 442, & seq. Marches against Constantinople, 445, c. Arrogant demands granted, sibil. d, e. Those in favour of the Arians refused, 446, a. His defign on Constantinople deseated, ibid. past. Driven out of Thrace, 447, a. Repulsed by Fravitus, ibid. b. His death, ibid. d, e.

Gaionatis taken by Theodosius, 360, c. Gaijo, the murderer of Constans, 280, d.

Galata, island, 672, not. 7. Galen, phylician to M. Aurel. 69, a. A further account of him, 120, & feq. fab not.

- his son's writings and character, ibid. Galeria, the daughter of Dioclesian, a christian, 206, c. Banished, 218, f.

- Annia married to Antoninus, 53, a. - Valeria married to Galerius, 209, f.

Galerius Maxim. created Casar by Dioclessan, 209, e. Adopted by him, ibid. f. His share of the empire, 210, 2. Mean extract, ibid. c—e. Works in Pannonia, 211, 2. Descated by Narses, 214, 2, b. Retrieves his honour, ibid. c, d. Behaviour to the Persans, ibid. e, f. Suspected by Dioclessans and Explanates him against the chrissian, 215, c. Exasperates him against the christians, 216, b, c, e. Forces him and Maximian to relign, 217, d—f. Declared emperor, 218, d. Tyrannizes over Dioclesian, 230, e, f. Shares the empire with Constantius, 231, c. Hatred to Constantine, ibid. & feq. Treachery to him, 232, a, b. Repulsed from Rome, 235, d, e. Dreadful sicknels, 239, b, c. Edict in savour of the christians, 240, 2, b. Death, ibid. c.

Galicia seized by the Vandals, 462, f. Ravaged by the Goths, 505, b, c.

Galla married to Jul. Constant. 266, d.

- the daughter of Valentinian, married to Theodosius, 407, d.

- Placida born, 407, d. Dies in childbed, 420, f.

- the wife of Dardanius, 468, (O). Gallicanus's rashnels, and the fatal consequences of it, 158, 2, b.

Gallienus created Cafar, 172, c-f. His father's collegue, 173, a. Success in Germany, ibid. c. Against the Alemani, &c. ibid. d, e. Treachery to his father, 174, f. Success against Ingenums, 175, b. Cruelty to the Massians, ibid. & seq. Commits the eastern forces to Odmatus, 178, b. Compounds with Aureolus, 179. Marches against Posthumius, 181, b, c. Cruelty to the Byzantines, ibid. c. Mock triumph at Rome, ibid. d. Gratitude to Odenatus, 182, b. Marches into Gaul, ibid. c. Defeats the Heruli, 184, d, e. Marches against Aureolus, ibid. f, & feq. His death, 185, against Aureolus, ibid. f, & seq. His death, 185, b. His relations put to death, ibid. c. His abhorred character, ibid. d. Deisied, ibid. e.

Horred character, total d. Defined, fold. e.

Gallus, the fon of young Conflantius, born, 266, d.

How faved from the maffacre, 275, a. Created Cafar, 283. Success against the Persians, ibid. c, d. Consulfinip at Conflantinople, 285, c. Success against the revolted Jews, 286, b. Defeats the Isaurians, 289, c. His suspicious and cruel temper, ibid. d, & seq. Raises a revolt at Antioch, 290, f, & seq. Cruelty to Mentius and others, 291, d, e. Slily invited by Constantius, 292, c, d. Arrested in his way to him, 293, b. Put to death, ibid. c, d. Zeal for christianity, 320, &

Gallus, the Roman general, his success against the Goths, 169, b. Treachery to Decius, 170, c. Proclaimed emperor, ibid. e. His extract and rife, ibid. & feq. Shameful peace with the Goths, 171, a. Persecutes the christians, ibid. b. Revels in 471, f.

Gannius, a favourite of Heliogabalus, plundered by him, 136, b.

Ganseric repulsed before Basas, 484, f.

Garamantes, who, 711. Trade with the Carthaginians, ibid.

Garba, island, where sited, 170, f.

Gargilius Martialis's writings and character, 149, fub not.

Gascony invaded by the Vandals, 453, f.
Gaudentius condemned to death by Julian, 327, e.
Gaudianus, a vile minister of Gardian, discarded, 162,

Gaugamela taken by Trajan, 20, d. Gavius, twenty years captain of the guards, 55, f.

Monumental inscription on Anteninus, 56, b, 57.

Gaul visited by Adrian, 55, f. Declares for Severus, 105, c. Reduced by Aurelian, 192, d, 194, e. The district of, with its provinces, 270, e, f. Ruined by the Franks, 283. Harassed by the Germans, 350, b, c. By the Vandals, 453, & seq. By Attila, 494, e, f. Erected into several kingdoms, 514, a.

Gaulif legions mutiny against Alexander, 145, c, d.

Gauls sacrificed to Hamiltar's jealousy, 830, b, c.

Gautier marches on the cruisade, 614, a. Defeated by the Hungarians, ibid. b.

Gaza, the temple of, by whom destroyed, 404, c. - the famed church of, built by Endexia, 433, a. Geberic's success against the Sarmatians, 265, b. Gela taken by Hamilcar, 750, & seq. Gelean women, their fignal bravery, 750, c, d. Gellius's treafon pardoned, 132, a.

- the Agrigentine, his immense wealth and profusion, 749, (M). Burns himself in the temple of Minerva, ibid. b.

Gelon defeats the Carthaginians, 728, f. Stratagem against them, 732, d-f. Victory over them, 733, & feq. Grants them a peace, 735, a, b. Vaft donatives, 736, 2, b, (D). His tomb demolished by Hamilco, 764, b.

Geminius, the twin of Commodus, born, 62, c. Generides made general of Rhossin, 640, d. His character, ibid. e.

Genialis Flav. made prætor of the guards, 100, f. Shuts himfelf up with Julianus, 105, f.

Genius. Vide Demon, 693, d. Gennadius's writings and character, 316, (G). Genobaud submits to Maximian, 208, d.

Genoese settled in Constantinople, 634, b, c. Removed to Galatea, ibid. d. Seize on several islands, 645, b, с.

Genseric, king of the Vandals, his character, 481, b. Allists Bonifacius in Afric, ibid. c. Falls out with him, 482, a, b. Makes peace with the Romans, 483, a, b. Surprises Carthage, 484, f. Success in Sicily, 485, c. Outwits Theodosius, 486, e, f. Invited by Eudoxia against Maximus, 500, e, f. Plunders Rome, 501, b, c. Deseated at sea, 503, d. Deseats the Romans before Alicant, 506, b. Makes peace with them, ibid. c. Breaks it, ibid. High demands on Leo, 507, b, c. In favour of Olytrius, 508, d, e. Resentment at his refusal, ibid. & seq. Outwits and defeats the Romans, 509, b, c, d. Makes peace with Zeno, 513, a. Succeeded by Huneric, 515, f.

Georgius, the Arian, succeeds Athanasius, 298, c.
Gepida revolt against Probus, 201, d. The same with the Lombards and Franks, 391, e. Kill one another in the dark, 495, d. Join the Avari, 535, Germa destroyed by an earthquake, 371, a.

German war against M. Aurel. 66, pass. Renewed with fresh vigour, ibid. f, & seq. Against Alexander, 145, b. Against Valerian, 173, b, c. Against Aurelian, 188, c. Against Probus, 199, & seq. Against Conflantius, 294, d. Julian, 301. Valensinian, 350, & seq. women, their bravery, 126, b. Germanicopolis, the capital of Isauris, 370, d. When made an episcopal see, ibid. e. Germanus forced to command the mutinous Romans, 534, d. Totally defeats the Persians, ibid. e. Defeated by Narses, 537, c. His death, ibid.

Germany visited by Adrian, 35, b. Ravaged by Maximin, 152, d, e.

Gerontius cruelly used by Constantius, 288, d.

- betrays the streights of Thermopyla to the nees, ibid. d, e. Sets up Maximus in Spain, 462, b. Success against Constantine, 465, d, & seq.

Desperate end, 466, c, d.
Gestoriacum taken by Constantius, 211, b.

Geta Severus, the father of Alexand. Sever. 104, b.

the fon of Severus by Julia, 104, f. Declared Cefar, 114. Chosen tribune, 118, b. Takes the name of Britannicus, ibid. d. Succeeds with his brother to the empire, 121, a. His sweet character, ibid. & seq. Hated by Caracalla, 122, b—d. Murdered by him, ibid. f. Declared a traitor, 123, b, c. Deissed, &c. ibid. d, e.

- brother of Severus, discovers Plautianus's ill conduct, 116, d, e.

Geta, their terrible inroads into Illyricum, &c. 522, c. Gildo revolts from Honorius, 438, c. His rife and character, ibid. d—f. Defeated and taken, 440, b, c. Hangs himself, ibid. d. His huge estate

b, c. Hangs manner, confiscated, ibid. e.

Gifco, the fon of Hamilear, banished and starved, 736, b. Recalled, and sent into Sicily, 785, e.

Made governor of Lilybaum, 851, e. Sent to treat the mercenaries, 853. Clapped in irons with the mercenaries, 853. Clapped in irons by them, 855. His miferable end, 860, e, f. Glabrio refuses the empire, 95. Gladiators restrained by M. Aurel. 80, a. Forbid by Constantine, 261, a. By Honorius, 451, b.

Glycerius takes the imperial diadem, 511. Deposed by Nepos, and made archbishop, 512, b, c. ceives him in his flight, ibid. d.

Godfrey's hostile march against Constantinople, 614, d, e. Treaty with Alexius, ibid. e, f. Gonderic, king of the Vandals, invades Gaul, 453, d. And Spain, 462, f, & feq. Driven out of Biscay, 473, b, c.

Gondiac defeated by Ægidius, 507, 2.
Gondibal supports Glycerius in his usurpation, 51 1, e.

Gondibal supports Glycerius in his usurpation, 511, e. Gondicavius, king of the Burgundians in Gaul, 468, d. Defeated by the Hunns, 483, b. Gondomarus makes peace with Conflantius, 298, b, c. Gongylas Conflant. defeated by the Saracens, 581, c. Gordianus, Alexander's counfellor, 138, d. Proclaimed emperor in Afric, 153, c. Enters Carthage, ibid. d. Letter to the senate, ibid. e. To the confuls, ibid. f. Acknowledged by them, 154, 2-c, & (S). Defeated by Capelianus, 155, c. Kills himself, ibid. d. His extortions and character, ibid. & seq. Poems and success in Afric, 156, his son made collegue, 154, pass. Defeated and killed, 155. Vol. VI. Nº 12.

Gordianus's grandfon chofen Cafar by the populace, 157, d. Appeases a dangerous tumult in Rome, 158, d. Chosen sole emperor, 161, b. His character, ibid. c. Abused by his ministers, ibid. d. Magnisicent games, ibid. e. Marriage with F. Sabina, ibid. f. Dutiful answer to his father. 162, (V). Success against Sapor, ibid. b, c. In Syria, ibid. d. Letter to the senate, 163, a, b. Pursues the Persian war, ibid. d. Deposed by Philip, ibid. f. And murdered, 164, a. His stately tomb and epitaph, ibid. b, c. conful's speech to the senate, 198, b.

Gorgenius bribes himfelf off, 293, c. Gorza, where fited, 858, (E).

Gothofredus's account of post-chaises, 26.

Goths invade the Roman territories, 160, d. Repulled by Gordian, 163, c. New inroads, 169, b. Defeated by Decius, ibid. & feq. Victory over him, 170, c, d. Sad defeat by Aurelian, 173, f. Driven out of Asia, 183, b, c. Ravage it afresh, 184, b, c. 300,000 of them killed and taken, 187, b. Make peace with Aurelian, 188, c. With Probus, 201, b. Descat the Burgundi, 209, c. Defeated by Constantine, 257, 2, 262, d, e. 100,000 destroyed by him, 264, b. Embrace christianity, ibid. c. Affist Procopius, 369, a. Defeated by Valens, ibid. d. Their apology to him disallowed, ibid. e, f. Deseated, 371, b. Obtain a peace, ibid. c. The articles of it, ibid. d, e. Driven out by the Hunns, 379, c, &c. 200,000 fettle in Thrace, ibid. f, & feq. A number of them encamp about Adrianople, 380, f. Provoked to revolt, 381. Their fuccess in it, ibid. & feq. Plunder the suburbs of Constantinople, 382. Repulsed before Adrianople, 387, f. Cruelties in Thrace, &c. 388, a. Destroyed in Asia, ibid. c, d. De-&c. 388, a. Destroyed in Asia, ibid. c, d. Defeated by Theodosius, 392, &c seq. Make peace with Rome, 393, c. Break it, 394, d. Deseated by Theodosius, ibid.e, f, 396, b. Settled in Thrace and Maxia, 397, b, c. Transplanted from Pannonia into Thrace, 480, c, d. Settled in Spain, 481, d, e. In Aquitaine, ibid. &c seq. Deseated before Narbonne, 483, c. By Etius, 484, b. How divided and settled, 496, b, c. Their treachery to the Spanish cities, 505, b, c. Ravage Lusuania, 510, c. Strive to revenge Aspar's death, 511, 2. Make war against both empires, ibid. e.

Grata, the daughter of Valentinian, 352, f. Turns nun, 420.

nun, 420.

Gratian, the father of Valentinian, his rife and merit, 346, c, d. Retirement, ibid. e.

the fon born, 346, f. Chosen consul, 350, d. Emperor, 352, d. Accompanies Valentinian into Germany, 354, d. His famous bridge, 355, e. Left to overawe the Germans, 362, f. Consultation e. Left to overawe the Germans, 362, f. Confirms his brother's election, 377, d. Divides the empire with him, ibid. e. Injustice to Theodosius, 378, pass. Remits his father's dues, 379, a. Some of his laws, ibid. b. In favour of the clergy, 282, c. d. Goes to successive Valent, 286, a. Con-382, c, d. Goes to succour Valens, 386, a. Courage and success against the Germans, ibid. & seq. Hastens to save Constantinople, 388, d. Recalls the orthodox, 389, a. Laws against heretics, ibid. b, c. Divides the empire with Theodofius, ibid. e, Goes into Gaul, 391, b. Into Illyricum, 393, Makes peace with the Goths, ibid. c. Success against the barbarians, 396, c. Some excellent laws of his, ibid. d, 397, d, e. Marches against Maximus, 398, c. Abandoned by his troops, ibid. d, e. Put to death, ibid. e, f. Interred at Milan, 399, c. His excellent character, ibid. c, d. Refuses the title of pontifex maximus, ibid. e.

the son of Theodosius, 390, f.

Greece over-run by the Castobochi, 69, b. By a grievous pestilence, 180, b. Ravaged by the Goths, ibid. c. Damaged by an earthquake, 328, c. Greek forbid by the Carthaginians, 679, (K), 773.

Greeks horrid flattery to Adrian, 38, d. Vast encomiums on Conflantine, 268, e. Invade the eastern empire, 433, d. Allowed a church at Conflantinople, 446, b. Massacred and burnt in it, ibid. e, f. Ravage Italy, 448, pass. Take and destroy Rome, 464, c, d, e. Ravage Gaul, 467, d. Invite the Bulgarians against the Romans, 628, e. Submit to the pope, 635, a. Shake him off, ibid. c.

Gregory's writings and character, 274, sub not.

bishop of Antioch, quells the mutinous Romans, 534, e, f.

pope, his flattering letter to Phocas, 536, f, & feq.

prefect of Afric, deseated, 544, d.

II. pope, stirs up the Venetians, 552, d, e.
Attempted by Leo, ibid. e. Letter to the Lombards, &c. ibid. & feq. Whether he assumed the supreme power, 553, d.

· Michael's general, defeated and killed, 565,

Greuthongi defeated by Valens, 371, b, c. Invaded by the Hunns, 379, d. Defeated by Theodofius, Grimould defeats Constans II. 545. Grotius's account of the Gepidæ, 391, e, f. Grumbates serves under Sapor, 306, f.

Gryllus, a wicked tool of Michael, 571, d, e.

Gubasas goes over to the Persians, 527, c, d. cherously attempted by Cosrboes, 528, a. Goes back to the Romans, ibid. c, d. Takes Petra, ibid. e. Treacherously murdered by the Romans, 529, b.

Guiscard, Robert, his extract and character, 609, e. Preparations against Alexius Comnenus, ibid. f. Success against him, 610, pass. Against the emperor Henry, 611, a. His death, ibid. c.

- Roger, relinquishes his father's conquests, ibid. d.

Gurgenes, king of Iberia, invaded by the Persians, 523, d.

Gyzacum taken and burnt by Heraclius, 540, f.

HAdrumentum. Vide Adrumentum, 668, e. Hæmus, mount, where situate, 169, b. Hali murdered by Mahwvias, 545, b. Haly, a private friend to the christians, 652, b, d. Hamilcar worshipped at Carthage, 692, c, d. His effigy and name on their coins, 704, c, d. Succeeds his father, 728, a. Successless war against the Sardinians, ibid. b.
the fon of Hanns, his expedition against Sicily, 732, a, b. Befieges Himera, ibid. b, c. Over-reached by Gelon, ibid. f, & feq. Defeated and killed, 733, pass. Desired, ibid. e.

- fent against Timoleon, 782, b. Defeated, Betrays the Syracusians, 790, d, e.

783, & seq. Bett His death, ibid. f.

Rhodanus sent to sound Alexander's defigns, 788, f. Method of fending them to Carthage, ibid. b, c. Ungratefully put to death, ibid. d.

- the fon of Gisco, succeeds him, ibid. f. Shipwrecked, 791, d, e. Defeats Agathocles, ibid. & feq. Recalled from Sicily, 799, a, b. Raifes the fiege of Syracuse, ibid. e, f. Deseated by the Syracusians, 801, c. His dismal end, ibid. d. His head sent to Agathocles, ibid. & seq. Throws Carthage into despair, 802, d, e.

fucceeds Hanno, 830, b, c. Outwits the Romans, ibid. d, e. Defeats them, 832, b, c. Defends Sipara, 834. Defeated by the Romans, 835, e. Offers of peace rejected, 836, e. Recalled to defend Carthage, $37, c. Defeated, $38, b, c. His miserable end, $42, b, (W).

Hamilcar's cruelty to the Mauritanians, $43, c.

Brave defence of Lilybæum, 845, b, c. Prevents the revolt of his mercenaries, ibid. f, & seq.

- Barcas fent general against the Romans, 847, e, f. His character and manner of encamping, 848, pass. Makes peace with the Romans, hing, 848, pail. Makes peace with the Romani, 850, & feq. Invincible hatred against them, 851, b. Resigns at the Libyan war, 853. Sent general against them, 858, b. Bold passage of the Macra, ibid. c, d. Deteats the Libyani, 859, a, b, c, 860, a, b. Severity against the bloody mercenaries, 861, c, d. Incloses them on all sides, 862, d, e, f. Puts them to death, ibid. & seq. Besieges the rest in Tunes, 863. Concludes the Libyan war, ibid. & feq. Reduces the Numidians, 865, c. His expedition into Spain, ibid. & seq. Success there, 866, past. Death, 867, a, b.

Hammam Leef, a hot water, described, 671, e, (D). Hannibal's smart rebuke to Antiochus, 706, (K).

Writings, 709, a.

chosen suffete, 738, b. Sent against the Egestines, ibid. & seq. & (F). Lands in Sicily, 739, a. Besieges Selinus, 740, a. Takes it, 741, e, d. Impious answer to the Syracustans, 742, d, e. Kindness to the poor remains of Selinus, ibid. f. Besieges Himera, 743, & seq. Entry into Carthage, 745, a. Second expedition and army, ibid. b, c, (I). Fleet, ibid. d, e. Besieges Agrigentum, 746, pass. His death, ibid. e.

faves Messana from the Syracusians, 819, 2, b. Brave defence of Agrigentum, 829, c, d. pulsed by the consular army, ibid. e, f. Aban-dons the place, ibid. f.

fent to coast about Sicily, 830, a. Destroys the Roman fleet, ibid. e, f. Deseated by them, 831, a-c. His punishment, 832, 2-d.

- his fon, fent to secure the Gauls, 845, e, f. Brings new supplies to Lilybaum, 846, b. Sent to affift Hamilcar, 861, d. Crucified by the mercenaries, 863, b.

- the child of Hamilear, taken with him into Spain, 865, c, d. Sent thither when grown up, 868. Becomes the darling of the army, ibid. & seq. Success and conquests, 869. Besteges Saguntum, 870, f.

- his tower, where fited, 670, 2.

Hanno's design of enslaving Carthage frustrated, 679, e, & seq. 787, a. His dreadful end, ibid. b, c. Unmeasurable arrogance, 707, a. Writings and navigation, 709, c, d. Tames the first lion, ibid. f, 710, (N).

fent against Sicily, 773, f. Undermined by Suniates, ibid. & seq. Sent against Agathocles, 796. Defeated and killed, 797, c, d. success against Æscrion, 810, a. Sent to fuccour Sicily, 823, & seq. Over-reached by the Roman consul, 824, b. Crucified, ibid. c, d.

the son of Hannibal, sent in his stead, ibid.

d. His success, ibid. & seq. Outwitted by Appius, 825, b, c. Suspected by Hiero, 826, b, c. Defeated by the Romans, ibid. d, e. Sent to relieve Agrigentum, 829, b, c. Defeated, ibid. e, f. Fined and degraded, 830, a. Killed in the defence of Olbia, 834, (R).
— defeated by the Romans, 836, past. 850, b,

Exasperates the mercenaries, 852, c, d. Sent against them, 855, e, f. Defeats them, 856, a. His indifcretion, 857, & seq. Succeeded by Hamiltar Barcas, 858, b. Sent for back to him, 861, b, c. Recalled, ibid. d. Reconciled to him, 863, c. Crucified in Sicily, 864, c.

- opposes young Hannibal's going into Spain, 868, c, d.

Harioban-

Hariobandus submits to Julian, 305, a.

Harmatius betrays Bafilifcus, 514, e. Promoted by Zeno, 515, a. Murdered by him, ibid. b. Harpocration's writings and character, 84, fub not.

Haumar, the Saracen, his conquests in Arabia, 543, b, c. Success against Heraclius, ibid. c, d. Other conquests, ibid. e, f. Begins a temple at Jerusalem, 544, c. Subdues Afric, ibid. d, &c. Persecutes the christians, 551, d, e.

Hebdomon, the christian emperors crowned at, 348.

Helena, the mother of Constantine, diverced, 226, e. Her birth and extract, 227, f. Really married to Constantius, 229, & feq. Whether a native of Britain, 230, a. Converted by her fon, 244, e. Finds the cross of Christ, 262, b. Her death and character, ibid. c.

 the wife of Julian, rendered abortive by Eusebia, 287, b. Her death, 312, b.

- the daughter of Constantine, 235, b. Helenopolis, whence so called, 262, b, c. Helio fent with the purple to Valentine, 480, b.

Heliocrates's moderation to Stilicho, 457. Narrow escare, ibid.

Heliodorus in and out of favour with Adrian, 50, sub Heliogabalus's extract, 132, & seq. Declared emperor, 133, b. Bravery and success, ibid. f, & seq. Acknowledged by the senate, 134, e. His vile character, ibid. & seq. Horrid murders, 136, pass. Journey into Bithynia, ibid. b. Appoints the worship of Eleagabalus, ibid. d, e. Whence furnamed Comazon, ibid f. Adopts young Alexus, 137, a. Plots his death, ibid. b, d. Murdered by the foldiers, ibid. e, f.

Helpidius put to death by Phocas, 538, a, f.

revolt and defeat, 557.

Helvius, the father of Pertinax, 96, e.

Hemeric's cruelty to his wife, 494, c. Stirs up Attila against her father, ibid. d.

Henry facceeds to Baldwin, 629, e. Wars against the Greek emperors, ibid. c, d. Death, ibid. f. Hephestion's writings and character, 84, sub not Heraclea taken by Maximin, 252, c. And burnt by the Perfiani, 532, d. By Michael, 566, b. Heracleus sent to recover Bithynia, 103, d.

Heraclianus defeats the Romans in Afric, 461, d, 462, a. His consulship erazed for revolting, 468, a. His great fleet, ibid. b. Deseat and death, ibid.

Heraclius's treachery to Ætius, 498; e, & feq. Death, 500.

the Edessan, his success in Libya, 509, b. Forced to retire, ibid. e, f. Conspires against Photas, 538, c, d.

the fon of the former, declared emperor, 538, f. Puts him to death, 539, b. Crowned, ibid. c, d. Marries his brother's daughter, ibid. f. Preparations against Cofrhoes, 540, a, b. Success against him, ibid. & seq. Releases 50,000 Persian prisoners, 541, b. Gains several victories, ibid. & seq. Wastes Lazica, and razes it, ibid. e. Destroys the Persian dominions, ibid. & seq. Returns in triumph, 542, b. Thankful journey to Jerusalem, ibid. d, e. Receives embassies from far and near at Edessa, ibid. f. Turns Monothelite, 543, a. Invaded by the Saracens, ibid. c. Retires to Constantinople, ibid. d, e. Persecutes the orthodox, and neglects the Mohammedans, 544, a, b. His death, ibid. c.

the brother of Conflantine III. disfigured by him, 545, f, & feq.

brother of Tiberius, defeats the Saracens in Syria, 548, c. In Cilicia, ibid. f. Put to death by Justinian, 549, b. Herbessus taken by the Agrigentines, 802, a. Its origin, ibid. (P).

Hercules worshipped at Carthage, &c. 690, a, b. Forty-five heroes of that name, ibid. b, (W). When that title ceased to be assumed, 220.

Herebus worshipped at Carthage, 691, d. Herenianus, the son of Odenatus, 183, d. His reign, 189, d. Death, 192, c.

Herennius Philo, his writings and character, 51, sub

Modestinus's writings and character, 149, sub

Heretics suppressed by Gratian, 379, b, 391, c. By Theodofius, 395, b, c, 404, e, 415, 2-c, 418, c. By Arcadius, 435, c, d. By Honorius, 454, e. By Leo, 511, a.

Hermippus's writings and character, 51, sub not. Hermits leave their cells to intercede for the Antiochians, 410, c, d, 413, b, c. Hermocrates's character and writings, 121, fub not. Hermogenes the fophist, his excellent character, &c.

83, fub not. 149, fub not. the Roman general, killed by Germanus,

355, b. - concludes a peace with the Perfians, 525, e. Hermogenianus's writings and character, 274, sub Herodes Atticus, a disciple of Favorinus, 49, sub not. Generofity to Polemon, 51, sub not. Confuship and high character, 57, d. Ill language to M. Aurelius, 70, c, d.

the son of Odenatus, 177, d. Killed with his father, 183, d.

Herodian's writings and character, 164, (W).

Hersa seized by Mundon, 521.

Heruli, their vast depredations in Afia, 184. Defeated, ibid. d. Settled in Thrace, 521, e, f.

Hesperus, the son of Ausonius, his promotion, &c. 401, & feq. fub not.

Heteriæ at Rome, what, 27, c.

Hiero chosen general of Syracuse, 816, e. His character, 817, a, b. Defeats the Mamertines, 818, Crowned king of Syracuse, ibid. e. Outwitted by Hannibal, 819, a, b.

- joins with Hanno against the Romans, 824, & feq. Answer to their consul, 825, b, c. Grows jealous of the Carthaginians, 826, c, d. Makes a treaty with Rome, 827, & feq. Friendship to them, 833, c, 835, d. To the Carthaginians, 861, e, f.

Hierocles, Heliogabalus's beaftly husband, 135, c. Killed by the soldiers, 137, e.

Hilarius, bishop, banished, 298, c.

a magician, burnt, 375, a.

Hilderic, king of the Hunns, born, 501, d.

Himera's noble defence against the Carthaginians, 732, c-e. Taken, 744, d.e. Razed, 745, a. Himerans noble defence against Hannibal, 743, past. Cruelly butchered by him, 744.

Himerus's character and writings, 339, sub not.

Leo's general, deseated, 576, f, & seq.

Himileo's preparations against Dionysius, 756, & seq.

Sinks the Syracusian ships, 757, a, (G). Repulsed by them, 758, e, & seq. Takes and razes Messana, 760, & seq. Invests Syracuse, 763, & seq. Builds three forts against it, 764, a, b. Deseated at sea, ibid. c, d. Reduced by a grievous pestilence, ibid. & seq. Deseated, 766, b, &c. Buys his slight, and & seq. Deseated, 766, b, &c. Buys his slight, and retires, 768, e, f.

- fuccels against Eumachus, 810, b, c. - journal, 709, b, c.

Hippacra revolts to the mercenaries, 861, c, d.

Hippana taken by the Romans, 833, a.

Hippo in Afric, described, 667, e. Taken by Sigifvult, 481, a. Besseged by the barbarians, 482, a,
b. Taken and destroyed, ibid. & seq. Restored, 772, c.

r I

2

Hippocentaur caught and brought to Adrian, 49, sub

Hippodrome at Constantinople, burnt by the mob, 519, f.

Hipponacra taken by Agathocles, 808, 2. Hipponitis, the lake of, described, 670, e, & seq.

Histories settle in Africa, 703, b, (H).

Hog, a carved one, over ferusalem's gates, 41, 2.

Holstein's account of Porphyry, 222, & seq. sub not.

Homer's works burnt at Constantinople, 515, c.

Honoratus defeats Gallus's cruelty, 290, & feq. Made first prefect of Constantinople, 305.

Honoria, the daughter of Placidia, taken with her at Constantinople, 475, f.

- fifter to Valentinian, her incontinence and treafon, 482, f, & feq. Demanded in marriage by Attila, 494, b. Honorius, whether the father of Theodofus, 390, b. - the son of Theodosius, born, 405, b. Chosen consul, 407, a. Declared Augustus, 423, b. Sent for, and proclaimed emperor of the west, 425, d, 426, c. Under the guardianship of Stilicho, 430, f. Comes to the empire very young, 432, b. Stripped of Africa, 428, f. Complains to Arcadius, 439, a. Recovers it, 440, pass. Laws against false informers, ibid. e. Marries Maria, 441, 2. Demolithes the heathen temples, 444, f, & feq. Retires to Ravenna, 449, d, e. Triumphant entry into Rome, 451, a, b. Fixes his feat at Ravenna, 452, a. Acknowledges Constantine his collegue, 455, e. Marries Thermantia, 456, e. Laws against heretics, 457, e. Provokes Alarie to invade him, 459, f, & ieq. His troops intercepted, and cut off, 460, a. Rejects Alarie's new proposals, ibid. f, & seq. His offers to Attalus seighted, 461, d. e. Supported by Theodolius, ibid. rejected, 461, d, e. Supported by Theodosius, ibid.

f. By Heraclianus, 462, 2. Agrees with Alaric, 463, e. Falls out with him, ibid. & feq. Breach of faith to Constantine, 467, b. Proves irreconcilable to Ataulphus, 470, a, b. Consirms the churches asyla, ibid. c. Enters Rome in triumph, 472, c. Makes Constantius his collegue, 473, d. Attempts the recovery of Spain, 475, d. Fall out with Placidia, ibid. e, f. His death, 476, a. Hormisdas's sumptuous presents to Aurelian, 191, f.

Revolts against Varranes, 209, c. · Sapor's brother, made general of Julian's horse, 329, c. Narrow escape, 332, b. Made governor of Hellespont, 367, d.

fuccessor of Coschoes, defeated by the Romans, 533, d, e. Sues for peace, and breaks it, 534, b. Defeated by Philippieus, 534, & feq. Dethroned and imprisoned by Barames, 535, a, b. His proud behaviour, and iniferable end, ibid. c.

the last king of the Persians, 542, f.

Horse's head, why stamped on the Carthaginian coin, 721, C.

Hortarius sues Julian for peace, 304, b. Hostilia Severa, the supposed wife of Gallus, 170, s. Hostilianus, the son of Decius, 168. Declared Casar by Gallus, 170, e. His death, 171, b.

Hugh, prince, fent prisoner to Constantinople, 614, a-d. Success against the Turks, 615, e. Shameful return into France, 616, b.

Humar's ill success in Thrace, $51, c. Before Constantinople, ibid. d.

Hunda married to Bonosus, 202, e. Favoured by Probus, ibid. f.

Huneric makes peace with Zeno, 515, f. Hunniades, John's, fundry victories over the Turks, 648, c-e. Defeated at Varna, ibid. e.

Hunns, their first sally, 370, c. Ally with the Alans, ibid. c. Invade the Goths, ibid. d. Incursions into the eastern empire, 433, c. Ravage Thrace, &c. 451, d, e. Cut off by the Romans, 459, e. Invited by the usurper John, 478, b, 479, a. Dismissed by him, 480, a. Driven out of Thrace, ibid. c. Assist the Romans against the Goths, 483, pass. Re-enter Thrace, 487, b, c. Defeated be-fore Orleans, 497. The end of their kingdom, 497, f. Defeated in Dacia, 508, c. Dreadful in-10ads into Illyricum, 526, d, e. Ravages about Conflantinople, 529, d. Put to flight by old Be-lissarius, ibid. c. Defeated by John Comagene, 618, a, b.

Hydroparastata, a set of Manichees so called, 397, a. Hymetius tried for treason, 358, b. Banished, ibid. c. Hypatia's excellent character, 471, d. Murdered by the christians, ibid. e.

Hypatius fined and banished, 374, e.

fians, 520, d. e. Defeated and taken by Vitalianus, 522, a: Released, ibid. b. Forced to revolt, 526, a. Defeated and put to death, ibid. c. Hyperechius cowardly delivered up by his troops, 367, c.

Hyrcania sends an embassy to Antoninus, 56, f.

Acob's stony pillar worshipped by the Canaanites,

693, b. Iamblichus refuses Julian's invitation, 326, d. an account of him and his writings, 84, fub not. Three of that name, 273, & feq. fub not. Their writings, &c. ibid.

James, bishop, saves Nisibis by his prayers, 279, b. Januarius, why not chosen emperor, 346, b. January, whence called Amazonius, 92, e, f.

fanus's temple or ened by Gordian, 162, c.

Jarbai's embassy to Dido, 722, b, c.

Jaspai's embassy of Greece, Jr, sub not.

Jashanies assists Alex. Angelus, 629, 2, b. Descated and killed by Lascaris, ibid. c, d.

Jaziges invaded by Decebalus, 13, e. Join in the German war, 66, b, c. Twice defeated, 69, c, de Join against the Romans, 73, b. Defeated, ibid. c. d.

Iberians submit to Trajan, 18, d. Refuse to come to Adrian, 37, b. Cruelty to the Himerians, 744, d. c.

Ibereus heads the Lembards into Germany, 391, d, c. Ibrions, who, and where fited, 495, b.

Icaus's character, coc. 29, fub not. Icarus's severe proconsulship, 403, c. Cruelty to the poor, ibid. d.

Icetas invited by the Syracuftans, 774, d, e. Strives to enflave them, 775, c. Defeated by Timoleon, 777, c, d. Makes a new alliance with Carthage, 785, c. Defeated and taken by Timoleon, 786, a.

Tragical end, ibid. b. fets up against Mamon at Syracuse, 813, d. Deseats him, ibid. e. Deseated by the Carthaginians, ibid. & seq. Iconium taken by the Turks, 605, a.

Iconoclasts, who, 553, a. Raise a revolt in the empire, ibid. The rest see under Images, 552, & ſeq.

Icofium delivered up to Theodofius, 260, 2 Idatius's writings and character, soi, (T).

- bishop, taken prisoner, 506, c. Idolatry forbid, 277, a, 298, d, f. By Theodosius, 403, d, e, 417, e, f. By Arcadius, 444, e, f. Whether revived during the siege of Rome, 458, c, d. Through the whole empire, 483, d.

ferom St. his account of the Gothish cruelties, &c. 388, a, b.

ferusalem visited by Adrian, 33, e. Profaned by him, 39, a. Taken and razed, ibid. e, f. How rebuilt and altered by him, 41, a, b. Plundered by the Isaurians, 451, f. Taken by the Persians, 539, e. Hard fate of the christians taken prison. ers in it, ibid. &c. Taken by Haumar, 543, f, the great church of, built by Constantine, 262, c.

fews revolt against Trajan, 23, a. Commit many horrid cruelties, ibid: c, d. Defeated, ibid. f. Revolt against Adrian, 38, f, & seq. Defeat and dreadful punishent, 39, & seq. Whether excluded fuden, 40, c, d. Join with Cassius, 76, a. Subdued by Caracalla, 116, b. Forbid to molest christian convers, 255, c. New revolt and punishment, 286, b. Forbid to buy christian slaves, 40a, f. Privileged by Arcadius, 420, c. Massace 404, f. Privileged by Arcadius, 439, c. Massacre the christians at Alexandria, 471, b. Expelled by St. Cyril, ibid. c. Massacre them at Antioch, 538, Forbid to come within three miles of ferusalem, 532, c.

Igillus taken prisoner by Probus, 201, 2.

Ignatius St. martyred. 19, d.

patriarch, his zeal, 572, 2. Deposed and imprisoned, ibid. b.

Ignomen hetrays Firmus to the Romans, 361, a, b. libel-Had-Deffa, a salt mountain, described, 671, d.

Ilium destroyed by the Scythians, 180, d.
Illus sent against Zeno, 514, d. Revolts, ibid. d.
Joins with Leontius, 516, b. Put to death, ibid.

Illyricum, the district of, with its provinces, 270. tyricum, the district of, with its provinces, 270. Sadly ravaged by the Quadi, 361, & seq. By the Goths, 388, c. How divided, 389, e, f. Ravaged by the Hunns, 451, d. The frontiers of, fortified, 468, a. The western part yielded to Theodosius, 483, e. Its extent, ibid. f. Repeopled by barbarian nations, 498, b. Ravaged by the Hunns, 526. d.

Hunns, 526, d.

Images destroyed at Constantinople, 552, c. By Leo, 553, b, c. By Constantino IV. 555, d, e. By Leo III. 557, a, b. By Leo X. 563, f, & seq. Allowed by the second council of Nice, 570.

Imilear joined with Hannibal, 745, b. Becomes sole commander, 747, a. Defeated by the Syracusians, ibid. c, d. Intercepts their provisions in a good time, 748, c, d. Horrid butchery of the Agrigen-tines, 749, past. Takes Geta, 752, past. Makes peace with Syracuse, ibid. f.

Incestuous marriages, a law against, 294, b.
India, whether any part of subdued by Trajan, 22,
f. Sends embassadors to Antoninus, 56, f. Traded with the Carthaginians, 844, (Y).

Indiction at Rome, what, 249, b. When and by whom begun, ibid. & seq.

Informers projecuted by Nerva, 3, c, 10, a. By Ma-erinus, 130, f, 131, f. Whence called quadru-platores, ibid. Encouraged by Maximin, 149, 2. Discouraged by Dioclesian, 214, b. By Constansine, 247, c. Revived by Constansius, 288, d, e. Suppressed by Theodosius, 394, b. By Gracian, 397, d. By Anastasius, 515, d, e. Ingenuus proclaimed emperor in Pannonia, 175, b.

Defeated by Gallienus, ibid.

Innocent, pope, sent to treat with Alarie, 460, d.
Institutes of Justinian, 530, e.
Intetene, the province of, yielded to the Romans, 215,
2. Where situate, ibid. c.

e sid

K.

32

4

30

John, a pious hermit, his answer to Theodosius, 422,

Arcadius's secretary, delivered up to Gainas, 445, d. Escapes to Constantinople, ibid. e, f.

- Honorius's secretary, sent to treat with Alaric, 458, d. Assumes the purple, 478, a. Taken and beheaded, 479, d—f.

a deacon, put to death, 486, b.

two historians of that name, 492, sub not. admiral under Basilius, his bravery and death,

509, 2-c. general of Zene, his success against Leontius, the Seythian and the crookbacked, their bravery against the Isaurians, 519, a-d. Against the Saracens, 548, b, c.

– the deacon, made admiral, 550, d. Killed for his severity, ibid. e. Vol. VI. Nº 12.

John Zimisces: Vide Zimisces, 553, & seq. - Comnagen. Vide sub Comnagen, 617, & seq.

Folopianus's revolt and death, 167, a.

foleph's treachery to Nicephorus, 582, a. Outwitted by him, ibid. & feq. Banished, 583, d, e. Retu-fes to submit to the pope, 635, a. Banished, ibid.

Joviani, who, 347, a. Jovianus sent into Pannonia, 313, d. Declared emperor, 340, a. His excellent character, ibid. b. c. Zeal for christianity, 341, a, b. Disadvantageous peace with Persus vindicated, ibid. & seq. Faithfulness vindicated, 342, d, e. Repasses the Tigris, ibid. f. Edicts in tayour of christianity, 343, & Commission of the Commission o seq. Of orthodoxy, 344, d, e. Death, 345, d. Whether natural or violent, ibid. e, f.

Jovinus fent into Pannonia, 318, d. Into Gaul, 345, b, c. Success and bravery there, 351, a, b, c. Piety, ibid. e, f. Different from the conful of that name, 352, a. Sent into Britain, 353, b. Against name, 352, a. Sent into Britain, 353, b. Against the Alemans, 354. Takes the imperial dignity, 467, a. His extract and character, ibid. e. Falls out with Ataulphus, ibid. e, f. Put to death, ibid. & feq. Vide & 349, f, & feq. Jovius made prime minister to Honorius, 460, b, c. Interview with Alaric, ibid. e. Swears perpetual war against him, ibid. & feq. Sent to treat with Attalus, 461, e. Treachery to Honorius, ibid. & feq.

feq.

Iphicles, the philosopher, informs against Probus, 363,

c, d.

Irene converted, and married to Constantins, 554, b. Difgraced for her devotion to images, 557, a. Takes the reins during her fon's minority, ibid. Allies him with Charles of France, ibid. d. Breaks off, and marries him to Maria, ibid. e, f. Stripped of her power, 558, b. Recalled, ibid. d. Undermines her son, 559, a-c. Causes him to be murdered, ibid. d. Enters Constantinople in triumph, ibid. e. Her popularity, ibid. f, & seq. Courted by Charles the Great, 560, a, b. Deposed and confined, ibid. c, d. Her death, ibid. e.

- encourages Alexius to regain the empire, 625, b-d.

Isaac Comnenus seizes upon Cyprus, 622, 2. His cruelties there, ibid. b. Defeats Angelus's fleet, Angelus's narrow escape, 622. Proclaimed emperor, ibid. d. Severity to Andronicus, ibid. e, f. Successes in Sicily, 623, a. Vain attempt on Cyprus, ibid. c. Treachery to Fred. Barbarossa, ibid. f, & feq. Forced to submit to him, 624, b—d. Defeated by the Scythians, ibid. e. His ever put out and sung into a prison ibid. % for eyes put out, and flung into a prison, ibid. & seq. Released and restored, 626, b, c. His death, ibid.

Isassenses protect Firmus, 360, e. Isaurians revolt, 182, e. And bravery, ibid. &cc. Reduced by Probus, 201, b. By Gallus, 289, c. Stripped of their plunder, and submit, 370, c, d.

Ravage several provinces, 451, e, f. Banished out of Constantinople, 518, e. Revolt, ibid. f. Deseated, 519, a. Maintain the war six years, ibid. d. Forsake their country, ibid. e, f.

Isdegestes, king of Persia, persecutes the christians, 442, b. Whether left guardian of Arcadius's children, 459, c, d.

Ishmael outwitted by Manuel, 568, d. Fury against Theophilus, 569, c.

Isidorus raises a revolt in Egypt, 69, f, & seq. - the supposed forger of Constantine's grant, Issus, the battle of, won by Severus, 109, e. Iraca, the antient name of Utica, whence, 665, d. Italy invaded by the Marcomani, 68. Ruined by Dioclesian, 210, 2. Ravaged by the Goths, 449, b, c. Freed from them, 451, a. Invaded by Radagaisus, 452, b, c. Subdued by Odoacer, 514, a, b. By Theodoric, 516, e, f. By the Lombards,

Italy, the district of, its provinces, 270, & seq. Judges, Constantine's laws about them, 256, d, e. Julia, Sept. Severus's wife, her lewd character, 104,

f. Studies philosophy, ibid. & seq. Prevents her fon's reconciliation, 122, d, e. Wounded at Geta's murder, ibid. f. In favour with Caracalla, ibid. & seq. 128, d. Starves herself to death, 130, c.

Mamea, the mother of Alexander, 137, b, 138, a. Supposed to have been a christian, ibid. b. Excellent education of her fon, ibid. c. High sway and titles, 138, e, f. Murdered in Germany, 145,

f. Deified by the fenate, 146, a

Julian the apostate's judgment of M. Aurelius, 78, d, e, 81, a, b. Of Porphyry, 223, & feq. sub not. His birth, 226, f. Partial censures on Constantine refuted, 266, d, 269, a, &c. Saved by Eusebia, 293, e, f. Declared Casar, 296, e. Sent into Sent into Gaul, 297, a, b. His success there, ibid. & seq. Noble desence at Sens, 298, d, e. Success against the barbarians, 300, c, d, 301, c. Against the Franks, 302, c. Alemans, 305, a. Stripped of his best forces, 308, & feq. Proclaimed emperor by them, 309, e, f. Accepts the empire, after having used some witcheries, 310, a, b, c. Generosity to Constantius's friends, ibid. d, e. How raised to the empire, ibid. & seq. Submissive deputation to Conflantius, 311, b—d. Success in Germany, 312, a, b. Imposes on the christians, ibid. c, d. Success against the Alemans, ibid. & Swears his army to him, 313, a. Letters to Athens, &c. ibid. b, c. Marches against Conflantius, ibid. d. Seizes Illyricum, ibid. e. Funeral obsequies to Constantius, 314, e, f, 320, d, e. Extract, education and character, 319, & seq. Abode in Ionia, 320, c. Singular hypocrify, ibid. d, e. Studies magic, 321. Abode at Athens, ibid. & feq. Cæsarship and behaviour in Gaul, 322, e, f. Writings, ibid. & seq. Frugality, 323, b, c. Reduction of taxes, ibid. d, e. Turns apostate, 324, a, b. Public entry at Constantinople, ibid. d, e. Severe profecutions, 325, past. Reforms the court, ibid. e, f. Which is composed of philosophers, magicians, &c. 326, a, b. And women, ibid. c, d. Meanness to the senate, &c. ibid. & seq. Journey to Antioch, 327, b-d. Partial justice there, ibid. e, f. Horrid cruelties and witcheries, 328, a, b. Pursued by a famine, ibid. c. His idolatry, & c. lampooned by the Antiochians, ibid. d, e. Writes his Mispogon against them, ibid. & seq. Renews the Persun war, 329, b, c. Deluded by the oracles, ibid. d. Sharply reproved for ed by the oracles, ibid. d. Sharply reproved for his apostasy at Bereza, 330, b, c. His hellish superstition at Carrhe, ibid. & seq. Ill treatment of Arsaces, 331, b, c. Enters Persia, ibid. e. Success there, ibid. & seq. Passes the Tigris, 333, a. Betrayed by the Persian guides, ibid. c, d. Burns his steet, and retreats, ibid. d. In great distress, ibid. f. Surprised by the Persian army, 334, a. Wounded, ibid. c. Last speech, ibid. e, f. Death, 335, a. Buried at Tarfus, ibid. b. Removed to Constantinople, ibid. c. His motley character, ibid. & feq. Hatred to the christians, 337, a, b. Vain attempt to rebuild the temple of Jerusalem, ibid. Writings, ibid. (H), (I). Laws against the christians repealed, 346, b.

the son of Constantine, besieged, 446, e.

Beheaded, 467, b.

- a friend of Constantius, unjustly condemned,

327, e. Julianus Salvius publishes his perpetual edict, 37.

his grandson, put to death by Commodus, 88,

. made captain of his guard, 91, a. Put to death, ibid. e.

Julianus Didius Severus, a wealthy Roman, buys the empire of the foldiers, 99, e, f. His rife and pedigree, 100, a-c. Character, names, &c. ibid. e, f. Acknowledged emperor by the senate, 101, pass. Cursed and pelted by the populace, ibid. d, e. Opposed by two powerful rivals, 105, & seq. Cruelty and despair, ibid. & seq. Fortaken and proscribed, 106, b, c. His death and burial, ibid. d. M. Aurel. proclaims himself emperor, 209, d. Stabs himself, 211.

Rusticus, a cast-off candidate for the empire. 352, b.

Julius made prince of Apfites, 18, c.

- Paulus, his writings and character, 59, sub

Didius, made proconsul of Afric, 92, c. · Solinus Polybiftor, his writings and character, 121, sub not.

Titianus's writings, &c. ibid.

Martialis, conspires against Caracalla, 128,
 e. Stabs him, and killed, ibid. f.

governor of Afia, destroys the Goths there, 388.

Junius Palmatus's success in Armenia, 140, c. Juno worshipped at Carthage, 686, pass.

Jupiter, when that title ceased, 220, b. Worshipped at Carthage, 687, a. Whence so named, ibid. (T).

Justa, the daughter of Valentinian, 352. Turns nun, 420, f.

Justin martyr, his farcasm on the heathens idolatry, 38, e. Presents his apology to Antoninus, 58, e.

(E). Not the fame with the martyr, ibid. the emperor, proclaimed, 522, e. His rise and character, ibid. & seq. Conspired against, 523, a. Rejects Cabades's proposals in savour of Cosrhoes, ibid. c, d. Edict against the Arians, ibid. e. Death and character, 524, a. Piety to the destroyed cities, ibid. f, & seq.

nephew of Justinian, proclaimed, 531, d. Incensed against the Avari, ibid. e. Cruelty to his kinsman Justin, ibid. f. Takes the Persarmenians under his protection, 532. Runs mad, ibid.

e. Death and character, 533, b.
Justina's great sway over Valentinian II. 403, a. Favours the Arians, ibid. b. Persecutes the orthodox, 406, d, e. Her death, 414, c.

the wife of Valentinian, 346, f. Her issue, 352, e. Goes with him into Illyricum, 362, f. Justinian's code compiled and published, 484, b, c. chosen consul, 523, b. Copartner with Justin, 524, a. Succeeds him, ibid. c. His proposals of peace rejected by the Persians, 525, c. gem against them, ibid. d, e. Concludes a peace gem against them, sold d, e. Concludes a peace with them, ibid. f. Insulted at Constantinople, 526, a. Fatal jealousy of Belissarius, ibid. e. Fresh peace with Persia, 527, b. Truce, ibid. f. Conspired against, 530, a. His death and character, ibid. b. Code, & c. ibid. & seq.

the kinfman of Justin, his success against the Persians, 533, b. Disgraced, ibid. c.

II. chosen emperor, 546, f, & seq. Ill success against the Bulgarians, 547, a. Breaks the peace with the Saracens, ibid. b. Defeated by them, ibid. c. Cruel revenge on the Sclavi, ibid. d. Bufies himself with building, ibid. e. His massacre of the Constantinopolitans prevented, ibid. e. Deposed, 548, a. Defaced and basished, ibid. b. Flees to the Chazari, ibid. e. To the Bulgarians, ibid. f. An instance of his unforgiving temper, 549, a. Restored to his crown, ibid. b. Cruelties and ingratitude, ibid. c. Defeated by the Bulgarians, ibid. d. Horrid butcheries, ibid. e. Taken prifoner, and beheaded, ibid. f.

Justinianus's

Justinianus's brave desence of Constantinople, 650, f. Lintientes break into Gaul, 386, a. Deseated, 387, Death, 653, a.

Juthungi revolt, 201, d. Invade Rhatia, 303, b. Defeated by Ætius, 481, e.

Juvenalis made captain of the guards, 106, f. Juveneus's writings and character, 275, sub not. Ized, the son of Mahuvias, wastes Phrygia, 545, b, c. Ravages Sardinia, ibid. - Mualbis revolts in Perfia, 552, b. Izeth repulsed before Constantinople, 551, c, d.

Egenes well received at Conflantinople, 600, a. Sound advice to the Roman general, ibid b. Kiun, some probable conjectures about that deity, 682, & feq. fub (P) Knights, when first used for secretaries, 47, d.

Abarum, or Constantine's standard, how carried, 242, e, f.

Lactantius made tutor to young Crispus, 256, a.

Lectus conspires against Commodus, 93, b, c. Raises Pertinax to the throne, 95, b, c. Excused by him, 96, b. Raises a revolt against him, 98, b-d. Put to death by Julianus, 105, e.

- general to Severus, reduces Mesopotamia, Death, ibid. f. Vide & 114, f.

 the wretch who advised the murder of Geta, 124, e. Put to death, ibid.

Lagodus driven out of Spain, 455, d.

Lamia, the story of, 806, (T).

Lamprias's account of Plutarch's writings, 50, sub not.

Lampridius's writings and character, 220, (C).

an enemy to Sylvamus, 294. Punished, 295,

Langres new colonied by the Franks, 212, b. Landicea declares for Niger, 109, c. Plundered, &c. Taken by Alexius, 616, e. By his fon, 617, f.

Largius Macedo murdered by his slaves, 11, b. Larissa restored to Zeno, 516, a.
Larunesia, islands, where, 672, sub not. 5.

Lascaris Theod. fides with the usurper Angelus, 626, c. His flight to the Turks, ibid. d. Erects Nice into a new kingdom, 628, a, b. Success against the Turks, 629, c, d. Death, 630, a.

the son of Vataces, success against the Bulgarians, 631, f, & seq. His death, 632, c.

John, his son and successor, ibid. & seq. His eyes put out, 634, d. Lascivius Tr. proposed to the empire, 98, b. Flees to Pertinax, ibid. c.

Lateran palace, when given to the pope, 248, d.

2

C.

Į,

12 21 Lawyers suppressed by Valentinian, 354, b.
Lazi submit to Antoninus, 56, f. Revolt to the Perfians, 527, c. To the Romans, 528, b, c. Abandoned by them, 529, a. Appealed by Justinian, ibid. b. Treachery to Heraclius, 541. Corrupt ed by Cosrboes, ibid. c, d.

Lazica, its fituation and government, 507, c, d. Leander Niconor's writings and character, 51, sub Legions, Roman, the state of, according to Dion Cass. 140, e. To Lampridius, ibid. f.

Lemnos plundered by the Heruli, 184, c. Taken by the Saracens, 575, f.

Lent, marriages forbid during, 394, a. And the execution of criminals, 416, a, b.

a. Submit to Gratian, ibid. b.

Leo, a cruel collegue of Maximin, 357, a, b. His death, 358.

- a tool of Eutropius, sent to Tribigil, 442, f.

Defeated and killed, 443, b, c.

pope, sent embassador to Attila, 497, c. His character of Martian, 504, c.

- I. proclaimed emperor, 504, c. His extract and rife, ibid, d, e. Makes peace with the Offrogoths, 506, e.f. Embassy to the revolted Marcel-linus, 507. And to Genseric, ibid. Vast sleet against the latter, 508, f. Descated by the treachery of Bafiliscus, 509, & seq. Promotion of Zeno the Isaurian, 510, a, b. Flattery to Aspar, ibid. e. Puts him to death, ibid. f. His death, 512, a.

- the son of Zeno, created Cafar, 512, a. His death, ibid. b.

- II. the Isaurian, sent against the Saracens, 550, d. Success against Theodossus, ibid. f, & seq. Proclaimed emperor, 551, a. Why surnamed Iconomachus, ibid. b. Edict against images, 552, b. Insulted by the people for it, ibid. c. Deserted by the Romans, 553, b, c. His death, 554.

III. proclaimed, 555, c. Succeeds his father, 556, d. Promotes his brother, ibid. e. Reception of Eleric, ibid. f. Severity against saint and image-worshippers, 557, a. Death, ibid b.

IV. Success against the Saracens, 562, e.

Proclaimed emperor, 563, b. Cruelty to Michael and his family, ibid. d. Victory over the Bulgarians, ibid. e, f. Severity to the image-worshippers, 564, a. Murdered at the altar, ibid. c. His character, ibid. & scq.

the fon of Michael, created Cæsar, 573, a. Over-reached by a monk, ibid. e, f. Released by means of a parrot, ibid. His excellent character, ibid. d, e. Defeated by the Bulgarians, ibid. & feq. Causes a schissm in the church, 575, c. By his fourth marriage, ibid. d. His life attempted, ibid. e. Invaded by the Saracens, ibid. f, & feq. His death and character, 577, a. Writings, ibid.

- Zoe's general, makes the Romans lose a victory, 578, f, & seq. His treason and death, 579, bishop, his wonderful golden machine melted down, 571, e, f.

Leon's noble defence of Syracuse, 779, pass. & f.

Leonas sent by Constantine to Julian, 311, d.

Leontia, the wife of Phocas, crowned empress, 536,

b. Her character, 537, a.

Leontium reduced by Timoleon, 781, e, f.

Leontius, bishop, his indiscreet zeal against Eusebia, 386, e, f.

- the Chalcidian, revolts against Zeno, 516, b. Defeated by John, ibid. c. Befieged three years in Palmyra, ibid. f. His death, ibid. & feq.

- Phocas's general, defeated, 537, c.
- a patrician, imprisoned by Justinian, 547, f. Deposes him, 548, a, b. Proclaimed emperor, ibid. & seq. Success against the Saracens, 548, b. Deposed, defaced, and confined, ibid. c. Put to death, 549, b.

Leptines commands the Sicilian fleet, 756, d. Inroads against Entella, 758, c. Success against Mago, 759, d. Defeated by him, 762, b, c. Killed at the battle of Cronion, 757, c.

tyrant of Leontium, submits to Timoleon, 781,

Leptis befieged by the Esturians, 349, c. Treachery to the Tripolitans, ibid. f, & feq. Punished, 350,

- the Major, and Minor, described, 669, b, c.

Lerias ken by the Suevians, 489, e. Leti a tempt the city of Lyons, 300, b. Cut off by Julian, ibid. c.

Leucadius condemned and pardoned by Maximus,

400, C.

Libanius's character of the turbulent Franks, 276, f. Of Julian in Germany, 298, 2, b. Elegy on Nicoof Julian in Germany, 298, 2, b. Elegy on Mic-media, 304, d. Silenced by Conflantius, 321, b. Speech in favour of Antioch, 330, a. Character of Julian, 335, & feq. pass. Speech to Valens, 372, e. Partial apology for Theodorus, 374, d. Narrow escape, 375. Invectives against Theodo-[ws, 403, ¢, f.

Libellers, Arcadius's law against, 453, c.
Liberius, pope, his reproof to Eusebia, 286, e. Banished by Constantius, 294, b.
Libo's death in Syria, 65. His widow married to Severus's freed-man, ibid. e.

Library, the capitol's, destroyed by lightning, 90,

Libya destroyed by an earthquake, 328, e.
Libyans, 200,000 massacred by the Jews, 23, d, e. Their odd manner of trading with the Carthaginians, 711, e, f. War with them, 851, & feq. Infult and imprison their general, 855, a. March towards Utica, ibid. & seq. Defeated, 858, a, b, 860, c. Cruelty to the Carthaginians, ibid. e, f. Dreadful condition, 862, d-f. Dismal end, 863, Lichudes, patriarch, banished, 603, b. Licianus Perpenna's revolt quelled, 171.

- the fon of Licinius, created Cafar, 255, e. Licinius marries Constantine's sister, 218, f, 250, e. Chosen emperor, 236, c. His extract and character, ibid. & feq. Sent against Maxentius, ibid. f. Chosen consul, 238, c. Present at Galerius's death, 240, b, c. Marches against Maximin, ibid. d. Joins Constantine at Milan, 250, e. Marches against Maximin, 252, c. His vision and prayer, ibid. d. Complete victory, ibid. e. Reception in Bithynia, ibid. f, & seq. Edict in favour of the christians, 253, a. Severity to Galerius's family, 253, e, f. Quarrel and war with Constantine, 254, c, d. Defeat, ibid. e. Peace with him, ibid. f. Second war, 257, c, d. Totally defeated, ibid. e, Superstitious speech to the army, 258, 2, b. Defeated at sea, ibid. c, d. Makes a new peace, and breaks it, ibid. & seq. Defeated and put to death, 259, a, b.

Constantine's nephew, put to death, 261, d.
Liguria plundered by Attila, 497, a.
Litybeum's brave defence against Dionysius, 773, d. Against Pyrrhus, 815, & seq. Besieged by the Romans, 845, a, b.

Limigantes among the Sarmatians, who, 215, c. Cut off, and driven out of Sarmatia, 303. Treachery to Constantius, 305, c. Cut in pieces, ibid. d.

Lions forbid to be hunted for shews, 470, c. Lippara taken by Hamilco, 760, b. Its situation, Gr. ibid. (K).

Lipparites success against the Turks, 599, d. Taken prisoners, ibid. e. Honourably dismissed, ibid. f. Lisbon taken by the Suevi, 505, c, d. Betrayed by Remismond, 510.

Listans, who, and where tited, 495, b.

Litorius's success against the Goths, 483, c, d, 484, c. Deseated and killed, ibid. d. His character, ibid. c.

Logi defeated by Probus, 200, f.

Lollianus unjustly put to death, 357, b. Lollins Urbicus's success and works in Britain, 57, e. Gentianus, the patron of Pertinax, 96, f.

Spurius proclaimed emperor in Gaul, 183, f. His rife, death, and character, 184, 2.

Lombards first invasion of Germany, 391, d, e. Found their kingdom in Isaly, 532, 2. Defeat the Romans, 545, c, d. Oppose the iconoclass, 552, f, London delivered by Constantius, 212, f.

Longinus over-reached by Decebalus, 13, f. Poisons himself, 14, a.

the philosopher, his writings and character, 196, (Z). Put to death by Aurelian, ibid. His character of the Mosaic writings, 197, sub not.

- the brother of Zeno, defeated by Leontius, 516, b. Set aside from succeeding his brother, 517, c. Raises new commotions, 518, e. Stripped and fent into Isauria, ibid. Revolts, ibid. f. Selonicus joins in Longinus's revolt, 518, e, Taken and racked to death, 519, e. Lopadusa, island, described, 672, sub not. 3. Lorium, the palace of, built by Antoninus, 56, c.

Lucas banished by Constantine, 265, f.
Lucian's shameful exaggeration of a Roman victory, 64, c. His character and writings, 81, & feq. fub not. Over-reached by Alexander, 82, fub Lucianus's noble defence of Nisibis, 279, b, c.

- count of the east, misrepresented to Arcadins, 432, d, e. Barbarously put to death, ibid. e. Lucilla born to M. Aurelius, 58, a. Married to L. Verus, 62, b, 65, b, c. Suspected of poisoning him, 68, a. Marries Claud. Pempeianus, ibid. c, f. fifter of Commodus, ravished and murdered by him, 86, c.

- plots against Commedus, 87, e, f. Banished and put to death, 88, a.

Lucillianus sent embassador to Sapor, 303, 2. Taken prisoner by Julian, 313, e. Commands his fleet, 331, d. Made general of Illyricum, 343, a. Murdered in Gaul, 345, b.

Lucius Onietus's extract and bravery under Trajan, 19, d. Made governor of Palesline, ibid. e, f, 24, c. Defeats the Jews, ibid. a. Deposed by Adrian, 33, d. Put to death, 34, c.

a pagan, attempts the life of young Theo-

Luisprandius seizes Ravenna, 552, d. Driven out by the Venetians, ibid. e.

Lupercus's writings and character, 185, (Y).

Lupicinus sent against the Scots, 308, e, s. Arrested, and well used by Julian, 311, a, b. Sent against Procopius, 367, d, e, f. Provokes the Gubs to revolt, 381, a, b. Deseated by them, ich.

Lupus forced to buy a peace from the Caledonians, 114, d. Terribly harassed by the North Britains, 117, f, & leq.

Luscus burnt alive, 293, e.
Luscania seized by the Alans, 463, a. By the Sue-vians, 505, c, d. Lutatius sent admiral against the Carthaginians, 849, e. His success against them, ibid. f, & seq. High demands on them, 850, d. Makes peace with them, ibid. & feq.

Lycaonia freed from the Perfians, 177, b. How divided by Valens, 372, d.

Lycians degraded by Rufinus, 422, a. Restored by Arcadius, ibid.

Lycifeus causes a mutiny in Agathocles's army, 803,

Lyons taken and destroyed by Severus, 113, f. Taken by the Vandals, 453, f. By the Burgundians, 504, b. Retaken by Majoranus, 505, c. By the Burgundians, 510, d.

Lysia visited by Adrian, 36, a.

Acedonius a hermit's noble speech to the Anj tiochian judges, 410, e. the orthodox bishop of Constantinople, deposed, 521, f.

Machaus's great conquests, 724, e, (E). Banished, 725, b. Besieges Carthago, ibid. c. Severity to his son, ibid. e, f. To the Carthaginians, 726, a. His punishment, 727, a.

Macodana.

Macolana, where fituate, 670, b.

Macrianus, a magician, instigates Valerian against the christians, 173, e. Treachery to him, 174, d. His rife and character, 178, e. Proclaimed emperor, ibid. f. Success against the Goths, 180, c. Defeated and killed, ibid. e.

king of Germany, submits to Julian, 305, a. Escapes Valentinian's forces, 157, f. Interview and peace with him, 362, d, e.

Macrinus induced by a foothfayer to aim at the empire, 128, c. Discovered by Maternianus, ibid. d, c. Murders Caracalla, ibid. f. Chosen emperor, 129, b. His extract, rife, Oc. 130. Letter to the fenate, ibid. d, e. Acknowledged by them, ibid f. Marches against the Parthians, 131, e. Forced to buy a peace, ibid. d, e. Wholfome and fevere laws, ibid. e, f, & feq. Clemency to fome configurators, 132, 2. Why called Marcellinus, ibid. c. Configured against by the soldiers, ibid. f. & seq. Shameful cowardice, 133, b. Flight, 134, a. Death, ibid. c, d.

- Var. his success against the Germans, 140, a, Macrobius's writings and character, 477, sub not. Meate in Britain, where situate, 113, b. Revolt, 119, e. Put to the fword by Caracalla, ibid. f. Make an advantageous peace with him, 122, b.

Masia conspires against Macrinus, 132, d. Her character, offspring, &c. ibid.d, e. Bravery and cunning, 133, pass. Made a senatres, 136, c. Great care for young Alexius, 137, a, b, 138, c.

put to fire and fword, 175, c, d. How divided, 254, f.

Magicians condemned by Constantius, 299, a, 304, e. Careffed by Julian, 326, b, c. A number of them executed under Valens, 374, f, & feq.

Magna, a zealous orthodox, 517, c.

Magnentius conspires against Constans, 290, f, & seq. Murders his friends, 281, a, b. Cruelties at Rome 282, 2, b. Sends deputies to Constantius, ibid. b, c. Success against him, 283, e. Insulting mesfage to him, ibid. f. Takes Scissa, 284, a. Bloody witcheries, ibid. b. Defeated at Mursa, ibid. & feq. Retires to Italy, 285, a; b. Beat out of it, e, f. Treachery against Gallus discovered, 286, 2. Forsaken by his troops, 287, c. Despair and death, ibid. e.

Magnus conspires against Maximin, 152, b. Put to death, ibid. c.

condemned to rebuild a church he had burnt,

346, d.

340, d.

Mago's genealogy, 708. Writings, 709, pass. Succeeds Machaus at Carthage, 727, f. Made their admiral, 759, c. Defeats the Syracusians, 762. Defeated by Dionysius, 769, & seq. Makes peace with him, 770, a, d, e. Returns to Carthage, ibid. f. Defeated and killed, 771, c, d.

his son succeeds him, 772, a. Defeats the Syracusians, ibid. b. c. Peace with them, ibid. d.

Syracusians, ibid. b, c. Peace with them, ibid. d. by Timoleon, 780, a, b. Basely for sakes Icetas, ibid.
d, e. Desperate end, ibid. f.

found Pyrrhus, ibid. b. Deseats him, 816, c, d.

(Albertia deseate)

Mahuvias destroys and fells the Rhodian colossus. 544, e. His fleet burnt, ibid. e. Success against the Romans, ibid. & seq.

Majesly, the law of, repealed, 3, d, 10, a, 34, e, Majoranus proclaimed emperor, 504, e. and extract, ibid. & seq. Success against the Vandals, 505, d. In Gaul, ibid. e, & seq. Deseated at sea, 506, b. Deposed by Ricimer, ibid. d. Put to death, ibid. e.

Majoratus promoted by Theodosius, 309, b, c. Majoza Malcha taken by Julian, 332, d, e.

Malaricus excuses Sylvanus, 295, a. Betrayed by Dynames, ibid. c.

VOL. VI. Nº 12.

Malasses's interview with Adrian, 37, b. Mallobaudes's success against the Germans, 387, a, b. Maltese language allied to the Punic, &c. 698, f, &

Malus's writings and character, 517, (V).

Mamai, St. the church of, why but half finished,

320, d. Mamea. See Julia Mamea, 138, & feq. The children of, who, 145, a.

Mamertines, their origin, 817, b, c, (H). Treachery to the Messaians, ibid. c, d. Descated by Hiero, 818, c-e. Forced to invite the Romans, 819, a, b.

Mamertinus, one of the judges of the Chalcedonian court, 324, f. Consulfhip and reception from Julian, 326, d, e.

Mamut's war with Manuel, 619, & seq.

Maniaces recovers the Roman plunder by a stratagem,

594. f. Revolts, 598, a, b.

Manichees suppressed by Gratian, 389, a. Three fects of them condemned to death, 397, a.

Manlius Attilius's stratagem against the Carthaginians, 835, (S). Defeats their fleet, 836, paff. Returns to Rome, 837, c.

Mantinea, the infamous temple and oracle of, 38, d,

Manuel defeated in Egypt, 543. His bravery faves Theophylus, 568. e. f. Forced to flee to the Saracens, 569, a. Restored to great honours, ibid. d, e. Retires, 571.

the emperor, proclaimed, 618, f. Treachery to the cruifadors, 619, 2, b. Wars with the king of Sicily, ibid. d. Makes peace with him, ibid. e. Distressed by the Turks, 620, 2. Makes peace with them, ibid. b, c. His death,

- the fon of Michael Paleolog. killed, 638, c. the fon of John, defeated by Bajazet, 646, c-f. Resigns to his nephew John, 647. Goes to beg assistance from the christian princes, ibid. c, d. Restored, ibid. e. Dies, ibid. f.

Marasas, general of the Persians, defeated and killed,

Marate-Cupris, the robbers of, put all to the fword, 371, e, f.

Marc, St. bishop of Ferusalem, 41, 2.

Marcellianus made a duke, 361, e. Treachery to Gabinus, ibid. e, f.

Marcellinus sent against Neapolitanus, 291, d. feats him, ibid. e, f. Lost at the battle of Mursa, 285, a. Sent with Julian into Gaul, 297, a. Leaves him in the lurch, 298, e. Accused and stripped, ibid. & seq.
brother of Maximus, defeated and drowned, raises a new empire in Dalmatia, 507, b. Joins with Anthemius, 508, c-c. Sent to invade Sardinia, 509, a, b. Assassinated, ibid. e.

Marcellus puts Serenianus to death, 368, f. Takes the imperial dignity, 369, a. Tortured to death for it, ibid. b.

marcia, a favourite of Commodus, 88, a. Befriends the christians, ibid. b. Doomed to death, 93, 6, Poisons Commodus, ibid. e. Put to death by Julianus, 105, e.

Marcian's revolt and punishment, 515, d, e.
general of Gallienus, taken prisoner, 482.

Marciana's good character, 9, c.

Marcianopolis, where situated, 370, c. From whom fo called, 9, d.

Marcianus's success against the Heruli, 184, f. The supposed murderer of Gallienus, 185.

general of Theodofius, taken prisoner, 482, Marries his fifter Pulcheria, 492, a, b. Chofen emperor, 493, a. His character, ibid. b. Why fet free by Genseric, ibid. d. Answer to the proud Attila, 494, a. Convenes the council of Chalcedon, 498, a. Laws in favour of the church, for. Admits Avitus his collegue, 502, b. His death and excellent character, 504, b, c.

Marcomani subdued by Trajan, 21, b. War with M. Aurelius, 66, b, c, & feq. Enter Italy, 68, & feq. Miraculoufly defeated, 71, & feq. Their treachery punished, 73, paff. & feq. Peace with Commodus, 87, a, b.

Marcomir's treachery to Stiliche, 433, f. Supposed the father of Pharamond, 434, a.

Marcus declared Cafar, 513, b. Marga, where situate, 257, a.

Maria, the celebrated fifter of Theodosius, 390, c. - daughter of Stilicho, born, 421, e. Married to Honorius, 441, a. Her death, 456, a. Rich tomb discovered, ibid. f.

Marina, daughter of Arcadins, born, 449, f. Her life, coc. 455, a, b,

Marinus's revolt and defeat, 167, b.

- kills himfelf, 294, c.

- a pleader, put to death, 357, b.

Marius Maximus, his history loft, 19, c. Writings and character, 149, fub not.

- Aurelius proclaimed emperor in Gaul, 184, Murdered, ibid. b.

Mark made emperor, and killed, 454, a Maronites settled in Libanus, 546, c. Defeated by Justinian II. 547, a.

Marriage of nieces, &c. made capital, 276, b, c. Between Jews and christians, 415, b, c.

Mars, whence to called, 817, (1). Marseilles besieged by Constantine, 137, f. When founded, 713, (A). Maximian's tomb there, 239, (F).

Martina married to Heraclius, 539, f. Poisons the Constantines, 544, b. Her punishment, ibid. c.

Martinianus created Cafar, 258, c. Sent against Constantine, ibid. f. Put to death, 259, d. - fent against the Persuans, 532, c. Baffled before Nisibis, ibid. d.

Martinus nobly withstands the brave Catena, 288, d, e. Kills himself, ibid.

- his house burnt by the Eutychians, 522, a. Martyropolis taken by the Persians, 520, c. Where fituate, 525, d. Besieged and forsaken, ibid. d, e. Where Betrayed to them again, 535, a. Retaken, ibid.

Martyrs, the æra of, when, 206.

Mary, princele, put to death by Andronicus, 621.
Majcezel defeated by Theodojius, 359, e, f. His fingular character, 439, e. Miraculous success against his revolted brother, ibid. & seq. Treacherously murdered by Stilicho, 440, e, f.

Massagetes invade the Romans, 519, e. called Turks, 531, e. Where situate, ibid. & seq. Deseated by Ocoman, 635, s. Ravage Hellespont, 636, 2.

636, a.

Maternus's revolt and death, 90, b, c.

Mathos, a ringleader of the Libyan war, 853, f, &c.

Reflectes Hippona, 859, c. Takes seq, 858, b, c. Besieges Hippona, 859, c. Hannibal and others prisoners, 863, b. Crucifies them, ibid. c. His own dismal end, 864.

Matta, &c. possessed by the Carthaginians, 731. Matthew, the fon of Cantacufen, assumes the purple, 645, d. Defeated and refigns, ibid. e.

Mavia sends succours to the Romans, 387, f.

Mauricus's free speech to Nerva, 4, b.

a general, forces Gordian to accept the empire, 153, c.

Mauritania, fecured to the Romans, 485, a. Mauritania, secured to the Romans, 485, a.

Mauritius sent against the Persians, 933, c. His extract and character, ibid. e, s. Vast successagainst them, ibid. & seq. Created Casar, ibid. f. Crowned emperor, 534, b. Success against the Persians, ibid. & seq. Kindness to young Costoboes, 535, d. Delivered from the Avari, ibid. e, s. Insulted by his soldiers, 536, a. Forced to retire, ibid. b. Put to death with sive of his children, ibid. d. Maurus, a wicked tool of Gordian, 161, d, e. Banifhed, ibid. f.

- bishop, crowns Julian emperor, 510, c.

Mausonianus proposes a peace to the Persians, 299, f. Maxentius's extract, &c. 207, d. Rejected from being Cafar, 218, b, 230, e, f. Proclaims himter emperor, 231, c. His character, &c. ibid. & feq. Deposed by Maximian, 235, s. Protected by the soldiers, 236, a. Success in Afric, 241, c. Cruelties there, ibid. d. At Rome, &c. ibid. & seq. Witcheraft and butcheries, 242, a, b. Breaks off with Constantine, ibid. & seq. Defeated by him, 245, d, e. Stratagem against him, 246, a, b. Falis upon himself, ibid. d, e. His defeat and death, ibid. e. Carried to Rome, ibid. f. The first raiser of the follis tax, 269, c.

Maxima, the wife of Chilo, accused of magic, 356,

Maximian chosen partner with Dioclesian, 207, b. His rife and character, ibid. c, d. Success in Gaul, ibid. & seq. In Germany, 208, a. Deseated in Britain, ibid. f. Success in Afric, 211, a. Against the Moors, 213, f. & feq. Religns the empire, 217, e, f. Resumes it to succour Maxentius, 233, f. Deseats Severus, 234, f. Maxentius, ibid. And Constantine, 237, d, e. Taken prisoner by him, 238, a. Ingratitude and death, ibid. f, & ſeq.

Maximin chosen Cesar, 218, b. Preferred to Maxentius, 230, e. His extract and character, ibid. f. Share of the government, 233, c. Consul-hip, 234, d. Created filius Augustorum, 237, b. Agrees with Licinius, 240, C. Crucity to Valeria, ibid. e, f. To Dioclesian, 241, a. Privately joins with Maxentius, 242, e. Enmity to the christians, 248, a, b, 250, b. Brings dreadful calamities on the empire, ibid. c, d. Marches against Licinius, 252, c. Defeat and flight, ibid. e, f. Poisons himself, 253, b. Dreadful disease and death, ibid. d. Followed by that of his relations and tools, ibid. & feq.

- brother-in-law to Valentine, his rife and cruelties at Rome, 356, d, e. Promotion, 357, c, 358, c. Bloody presectship, ibid. d. Instigates Valentinian against the Quadi, 361, e. Put to death, 377, f.

Maximinus condemned to death, 88.

- a Gothish general, his revolt in Gaul, 145, d. Murders Alexander, 146, a. Declared emperor, 150, & feq. His extract, strength, and gigantic stature, 152, 2, c, c. Devouring stomach, ibid. d. Rise under Alexander, ibid. c, f. Horrid cruelties, 152, pass. Wastes all Germany, ibid. d. Narrow escape, ibid. e. Victories, ibid. e, f. Goes into the north, ibid. & feq. New cruelties, 153, a, b. Proscribed by the senate, 154, a. His friends massacred, ibid. b. Mad behaviour, ibid. & seq. Marches into Italy, 158, d, e. Assassinated before Aquileia, 159, c, d. His head brought to Rome, 160, b.

- his son, declared Casar, 150. His character, 151, f. Made partner of the empire, 152, a. Proscribed with his father, 154, a. And asfassinated with him, 159, c.

Maximus Pupien. Vide Pupienus, 156, & seq. - teaches Julian magic, 321, b. Careffed at court, 326, b. His character and arrogance, ibid. c, d. And writings, 339, sub not. Imprisoned and put to death for his witcheries, 248, d, 375,

- the father of Euclid, different from the magician, ibid.

general in Britain, his revolt, 397, f. His extract and character, 398, a, b. Crosses over to Gaut, ibid. c. Defeats and kills Gratian, ibid. & feq. A scurvy pun turned into a prophecy by his tools, 399, e. Acknowledged Theodosius's collegue, 401, a, b. Invades Valencinian's territories.

INDEX.

412, c. Takes several cities from him, ibid. d, Defeated by him, 413, a, b. Put to death, ibid. c, d.

Maximus made emperor in Spain, 462, a, b.

Petronius undermines Ætius, 499, a. Murders Valentinian, and mounts the throne, ibid. d, e, 500, b, c. Forces his widow to marry him, ibid. e, f. Murdered, 501, a.

Maxula, where fituate, 666, d. Described, ibid.

Mazara, whether a town or river, 741, (G).

Mazices, who, 360, b. Submit to Theodosius, ibid-Defeated by him, ibid. c.

Maziehi, where situate, 452, b. Ravage Egypt, ibid. Mebarsapes's treachery to Trajan, 18, e, f.

Mecca seized by Mohammed, 543, a. Modea taken by the Saracens, 550, b. Media subdued by Cassius, 65, c.

Medina taken by Mohammed, 543, a.

Megara, one of the three parts of Carthage, 662, d, Mejellus Luc. Posthum. success in Sicily, 829, & seq. Mejerda, river, stops up the Carthaginian harbour, 663, c.

Melchiades, bishop of Rome, highly esteemed by Constantine, 248, c.

Melenus entertains the emperor, 591, c. Confined by him for his wealth, ibid. d.

Melitene becomes an opulent city, 18, d. - the legion of, why called Thundering, 72, Memmia married to Alexander, 139, b. Menelaus, a famed archer, killed by Romulus, 284, f. Menophilus defends Aquileia, 158, f, & feq.

Mentz taken by the Vandals, 453, c.

Mercenaries revolt against the Carehaginians, 851, & feq. Their odd mixture and arrogance, 853, paff. 855, a, b. The rest see sub Libyans.

- in Sicily, revolt and cruelties, 864, b, c. Mercury worshipped at Carchage, 689, d, (U). Merdoja declared Coschoes's successor, 542, a. Murdered by his brother, ibid. b. Merida taken by Richila, 484, f. Taken and ravaged by the Goths, 510, c.

Mermeroes defeated by Dorosheus, 524.c, f. Relieves Petra, 528, c. Repulsed before Archeopolis, ibid.

Merobaudes kills Macrinus, 362, f. Proclaims young Valentinian emperor, 377, c, d. Commands under Gratian, 398, d. Put to death by Maximus, 400, 2.

Aresene, island, taken by Adrian, 22, b.
Mesomenes stripped of his pension by Antoninus, 56,

Meopotamia subdued by Trajan, 18, s. Put under tribute, 21, b, c. Reduced by Latus, &c. 111, c. Revoits, 139, e. Ravaged by the Persians, 141, f. Recovered by Gordian, ibid. d. Invaded by the Persians, 276, a, b, 296, c. Put to fire and sword by the Saracens, 513, a. By Cofrbaes, 527, Messala proscribes Julianus, 106, c.

- Silius put to death by Heliogabalus, 136, e. Messana invested by Hamilco, 760, b, c. Taken and razed, 761, a, b. Taken by Timoleon, 780, c. Maffacres the Corinthians, 817, c, d. Invites the Romans against Carthage, 822, b, c. Receives them, 824, b, c. Besieged by Hanne, 825, a, b. Taken by the Romans, 826, d, e.

Messengers of good news, their extortions restrained, 366, b.

Meffian family, an account of, 168, b.

Messianus's embassy and entry into Tholonse, 500, d. Methodius's learned consutation of Porphyry, 224, Sub Metius, Cassius's son, put to death, 77, a. F. Nicomach. speech to Taciuns, on his being chosen emperor, 198, d.

Mezentius's dreadful punishment revived, 131, f. Mezizius proclaimed at Syracuse, 545, e. Put to death, ibid.

Michael chosen emperor, 562, d, e. Deseated by the Bulgarians, ibid. e, f. Resigns the empire to Leo, 563, pass. Imprisoned by him, ibid. d.

—— Traulus forces Leo to accept of the empire, 563, b. Treason and condemnation, 564, b. Mounts the throne by murder, ibid. c, d. Cruelty to Theodosia and her four sons, ibid. e. Horaid heresis ibid. d. 85 fee. Deseated by Theorem rid heresies, ibid. d. & seq. Deseated by Thomas, 565, b. Calamities under his wicked reign, 567, a, b. His death, ibid. d.

- the fon of Theophylus, taken into partnership, 569, d. Becomes a second Nero, 571, c-e. Defeated by the Suracens, ibid. f. Expedition into Crete, 572, c. Murdered by Basilins, ibid. f. Funeral honours, 574, e.

- a Paphlagonian, raised to the empire, 595, e, f. Leaves the government to his brother ? 596, a—c. Reigns the empire, and dies, 597, b, c.

Calaphates raised to the empire, 597, d. Cruelties and deposition, ibid. d, c.

- Stratonicus chosen emperor, 601, c. His inability, ibid. d. Conspired against, ibid. & seq. Defeated, 602, c, d. Refigns, ibid. f.

- Ducas fet up by his uncle, 605, f, & seq. His fatal indolence, 606, b. Why nicknamed Parapanaces, 607, b, c. Forced to relign, ibid. d, e.
Flees to Robert Guiscard, 609, e, f.

Paleologus deteated by the Turks, 635, f.
By the Catalans, 636, e, f. Dies for the loss of his fon, 638, c, d.

Milan seized by Aureolus, 179, f. Taken by Con-flantine, 245, f. Why the metropolis of Italy, 271, b. Taken by Attila, 437, a.

Miletene taken by Constantine, 555, c.

Militia magistri, their office and number, 271, b, d. Minerva's temple at Agrigentum, why burnt, 749, b. Minervina married to Conftantine, 230, e.

Minervius's writings and character, 316, (G) Minutianus's writings and character, 168, (X).

Missibeus chief minister to young Gordian, 161, f. Letter against his wicked ministry, 162, a, (T). Signal merit, ibid. & feq. Honoured by the fenate, 163, b. Death, ibid.c. Misua, where sited, 667, a.

Mnesheus's conspiracy against Aurelian, 195, b. Cruel death, ibid. d.

Modares goes over to the Romans, 392, e. His character, ibid. f.

Moderatus, one of Fauslina's gallants, promoted, 78, d. Modeflus's crucities in Palestine, 305, c, f. To the orthodox, 372, a.

Mohammed spreads his doctrine, 543. His death and successor, ibid. b.

general of the Saracens, fent against Justinian II. 547, b. Defeats him, ibid. c. Recovers Armenia, 548, c.

- invites the Turks to his affishance, 198, f. His death, 599, f.

- the fon of Bajaxet, defeats his four brothers, 647, f.

- the fon of Amurat, butchers all his brothers, 649, b, c. Shuts up the mouth of the Bosporns, ibid. e. Besieges Constantinople, 654, & seq. His sleet forced by the Genoese, 651, c, d. Impotent rage against them, ibid. d. e. Prodigious causway and bridge, ibid. e, f. Cruelty to the Confentinopolitans, 652, & scq.

Moloch, the same with Chrosos, 682, & Soq. Sub (P). Monaxes's house burne at Constantinople, 463, b. Monaxius chosen consul with Plintha, 473, 2.

Monks confined to their deserts, 418, a. Suppressed by Constantius IV. 555, d. c.

Monomachus sent to poison Cantacusenus, 644, d. Monothelites, their doctrine, 543, 2. Condemned by the council of Constantinople, 546, e, f. Revived by Philippicus, 550, d.

Months, the names of, how changed by Commodus, 92, e.

Montius's noble speech to Gallus, 291, d. Miscrable death, ibid. c.

Moors repulsed and defeated by the Romans, 58, b, c. Driven out of Spain, 70, 2. Defeated and transplanted, 213, f, & seq.

Mop/ucrene, where sited, 314, d. The place where Constantine died, ibid. e.

Mopsuestia preserved by Antoninus, 57, b. Taken and fortified by the Saracens, 548, d.

Mopfus, who, 691, e. Worshipped at Carehage, ibid.

Mortagon comes to the relief of Constantinople, 565, e. Defeated, ibid. f.

Mosoles Alexius set up by the Armenians, 558, e. His punishment, ibid. f.

Motya belieged by Dionyfiss, 756, b, c. Its fituation, ibid. d. Stout defence, 757, c, d. Taken and plundered, 758, b, c. Retaken by the Carthaginians, 759, d.

Mundon, the Goth, invades the Romans, 521, a.

Mundus quells a riot at Constantinople, 526, c. Mursa, a city in New Pannonia, 211, 2. Where situate, 284, b. The battle of, ibid. d. Fatal to the empire, ibid. & seq.

Mursia ruined by the Quadi, 383, c.

Muscovites have fainted Constantine the Great, 268, c. Mustapha strangled by Amurat, 648, a, b. Musulani, who, and whence, 666, c, (B).

Mutina taken by Confiantine, 245, f.

Muzah made guardian to John Lascaris, 632, c.

Assassinated by the nobility, ibid. e.

Mysticus Nicol. excommunicates the emperor Leo, 575, c. Deposed, ibid. d.

Myttistratum taken and destroyed by Collatinus, 823, b, c.

Aar-malcha, the canal of, by whom made, Nabal, a city in Tunes, 667, d.

Nachoragan defeated in Lazica, 529, b, c. Nannianus's success against the Lentienses, 387, a, b. Nanninus's defeat and flight, 355, f. Nannius's success against the Franks, 413, d Naravasus saves Hamilcar's army, 859, & seq.

Narbonne burnt, 58, f. Restored by Antoninus, 59, a.

Taken by Ataulphus, 469, a. Relieved by Litorius, 483, c. Betrayed to the Visigoths, 507, a.

Narcissus, a wrestler, in favour with Commodus, 87, Strangles him, 93, f. Condemned to the wild bealts, 113, f.

Narisci revolt from the Romans, 63, c. Make peace with them, ibid. d.

Narses deseats the Romans, 214, a. Deseated by them, ibid. c, d. Sues for peace, ibid. e, f. Obtains it, 215, a, b.

fent with a proud message to Constantius, 302. Pardoned by Maximus, 400, c.
deseated by the Romans, 474, c, d. Success against them, 523, e. Revolts to them, ibid. e. Spirits up Cosrhoes against Phocas, 537, b, c. Defeats the Germans and Leontius, ibid. Burnt alive by Phocas, ibid.

Naulobat heads the Heruli, 184, c. Surrenders to Gallienus, ibid. e.

Nazar defeats the Saracens fleet, 573, d.

Nazarini's writings and character, 272, (F). Character of Julian, 310, e, f.

Nazianken's character of Julian, 310, e, f, 335, & seq. Just suspicion of his hypocrify, 322. Studies under Proereses, 338, sub not. Dreadful account of the Gothish invasion, 392, a, b. Made bishop of Constantinople, 395, a. Letter to Ellebichus, 409, b.

Neapolis, an antient emporium of the Carthaginians, where lited, 667, d.

Nebridius refuses to swear to Julian, 213, b. Marries Salvina, 390, e.

Nectaridus killed in Britain, 353, c.

Nectarius, bishop, burnt in his house by the Arians,

Neocasarea ruined by an earthquake, 277, c.

Neocastrum, a Turkish fort at the mouth of the Bofporus, 649, d.

Neotherius lent into Afric, 350, d.

Nephiris, where situate, 667, 6

Nepos Licinius's decrees about fees, 13, b.

deposed by Glycerius, 512. Flight, ibid. d. Nepotianus's revolt, 281, d. Betrayed and killed, ibid. e.

- sent against Remismond, 506.

Neptune, one of the Carthaginian deities, 687, 2, b. Neratius Priscus, a great lawyer, in favour with Trajan, 25.

Nerva Cocceius, the beginning of his reign, 1. Origin, ibid. & seq. Excellent character, 2, b, c. Fearful of Domitian, ibid. e, f. Happy reign, 3, b. Generofity, ibid. e, & feq. Lenity, 4, 2, 5, 2, b. Adopts Trajan, ibid. c, d. His death, ibid. f, e feq.

Nestor's writings and character, 121, sub not.

Julianus put to death by Heliogabalus, 136, 2.

Nestorius condemned by a council, 482, c. Nevers, count, affifts dianuel, 646, d. Taken pri-foner, ibid. e, f. Nevira fent into Pannonia, 313, c, d. Left to guard Sucidava, ibid. e. Made one of the judges of the Chalcedonian court, 324, b. His confulfity and reception from Julian, 326, d, e.

Nicagoras's writings and character, 168, (X). Nice utterly destroyed by an earthquake, 328, a. Taken by Procopius, 367, a. Overturned by an earthquake, 371, a. Delivered up to Sclerus, 588.

Taken by the christians, 615. Made into the christians, 615. Made into the christians, 615.

Nicea rebuilt by Adrian, 36, c. Fined for abusing Hipparchus, 64, d. The battle of, 109, b.

Nicephoras's account of Helena confuted, 228, & feq. Nicephorus rebels against his brother, 556, e. Ba-nished, ibid. f. Severely used by Constantine III.

- the brother of Constantine, banished and murdered, 559, d.

a patrician, deposes Irene, 560, b, c. De-clared emperor, ibid. d. Instances of his cruelty, 561, b. Defeated by the Saracens, ibid. c, d. Slain, 562, c. His character, ibid. d.

- Phocas's success in Crete, 582, c. Sent for to court, ibid. & seq. Forced to take the purple, 583, b, c. Excommunicated and restored, ibid. e. Success against the Saracens, ibid. & seq. Murdered, 584, d. His character, ibid.

. Uranus's success against the Bulgarians, 591, e, f.

Comnenus's eyes put out for being virtuous, 593, d, e.

outwitted by Theodora, 602.

- Basilianus taken prisoner by the Turks, 605,

Botoniates usurps and religns the empire, 607, & leq.

Niceras conspires against Phocas, 538, c, & seq. Murdered by Nicephorus, 561, b.

Nicomachus's arithmetic, 273, fub not. Writings and character, 197, sub not.

Nicomedia repaired by Adrian, 36, c. Plundered by the Scythians, 180, a. Beautified by Dioclesian, 219, d, e. Destroyed by an earthquake, 304, c. Rebuilt by Julian, 327, b. Taken by the Turks, 642, c.

- the palace of, burnt, 216, d. Nicopolis in Dacia, by whom built, 15, c.

Niger's

Niger's success in Dacia, 87, c.

· Pescennius made governor of Syria, 87, e. Success against the rebel Masernus, 90, c. Excellent character, 101, f, & seq. Rise and strict discipline, 103, pass. Revolts in Syria, 105, pass. Prepares against Severus, 108, & seq. Proscribed by the senate, ibid. e, f. Defeated, 109, b. Retires to Antioch, ibid. c. Deseated and put to death, ibid. d-f. His black statue described, 110, b, (M).

Nigrinus Domis. put to death, 34, c.

brave defence at Aquileia, 313, f.

executed for a jest, 364, c.

Ninitinghus joins in Longinus's revolt, 518, f. Slain, 519, 2.

Ninos, Nineve, taken by Trajan, 20, d.

Nijibis taken by Trajan, 19, 2. By Severus, 114, 2. The dreadful battle of, 131, d. Besieged by Arsaxerxes, 141, f. Taken by Sapor, 162, b. Retaken by Gordian, ibid. d. By the Persians, 174, b. By Odenatus, 178, b. Three times besieged by the Persians, 276, b. A fresh siege, 279, b, c. Yielded to the Persians by Jovian, 342, f. The melancholy surrender of it, 343, c, d. Besieged by Martaburius, 474, d. Abandoned in a. great fright, 475, a.

Nismes, the antiquities of, by whom built, 35, d. The birth-place of Antoninus Pius, 49.

Nissa, the place of Constantine's birth, 227, c, d. Nobilifimus, when first given, 272, b.

Nobility, their arrogance suppressed by Constantine, 255, c.

Nohadurus's attempt on Baine, 289, d.

Nonia Celsa, Macrinus's wife, 130, b. Intitled Augusta, ibid. f.

Nonnichias's desperate end, 466, d.

Nonnius Marcellinus's writings and character, 317, sub not.

Norici deteated by Ærius, 481, e.

Notitia imperii, when and by whom written, 502,

Novella, the constitutions of Justinian, so called, 531, a, b.

Novempopulania, the antient name of Auch, 471, f. Nubians ally with the Romans, 213, e. Repulsed by Marcian, 498, b.

Numenes's writings and character, 82, fub not.

Numerianus's stratagem in favour of Severus, 112, b. - the son of Carus, created Casar, 204, c. Proclaimed emperor, 205, b. Killed by Aper, ibid. c. His character and funeral obsequies, ibid. d, e. Numidia kept by the Romans, 485.

Numidians revolt to Agathocles, 804, b. Treachery to him, ibid. d. Some of their tribes subdued by Archagathus, 808, d, (Z). Break out against the Carthaginians, 838, c, d. Cruelly punished by Hamilcar, 843. c. Nuns well treated by Sapor, 306, 2.

0.

Ass, a dismal place in Libys, 437, a.

Obelisk brought from Egypt to Rome, 299, d. Another fet up at Constantinople by Theodosius, 418, a.

Octacius Man. Craff. his success in Sicily, 826, & seq. Octavian forced out of the house of an ecclesiastic, 352, b.

c. His extract and character, ibid. d, e. Brave Odenatus Palmyrensis's embassy to the Persians, 177, royal title, 178, a. Promoted by Gallienus, ibid. Penetrates into Persia, ibid. c. Success there, ibid. d, e. Besieges Emessa, 180, e. Created partner of the empire, 182, b. Success against the Persians, 183, b. Drives the Goths out of Asia, His death, ibid. d. ibid. c. VOL. VI. Nº 12.

Odoncer descated by Childeric, 510, d. His extract and character, 513, c, d. Puts Orestes to death, ibid. e. Kindnes to his son, ibid. f. Takes the title of king of Italy, 514, a. Defeated by Theodoric, 516, e, f.

Odonachus driven out of Lazica, 528, e.

Odotheus over-reached by Promotus, 407, b. His defeat and death, ibid. c.

Olbia taken by the Romans, 834, b, c. Olbianus's success against Thomas, 565, e, f, & seq.

Oleades subdued by Hannibal, 869, c, d.
Olybrius raised by Gratian, 389, c. By Theodosius, 425, & feq.

marries Placidia, 507. Proclaimed emperor, 511, c. His death, ibid. d. Olympia belieged by the Persians, 370, 2. Suffered to escape, ibid. b.

Olympiodorus's account of the fiege of Rome, 458, b.

Other writings and character, 476, (R).
Olympius, Jupium, the temple of, at Athens, finished, 42, d.

Nemesianus's writings and character, 205, (B).

a philosopher heads the heathens against the christians, 416, f. Retires out of Egypt, 417 a confident of Honorius, discovers Stilicho's treason, 456, a, b. Made his prime minister, 457, c. His character and zeal against heretics, ibid. d, e. Difgraced, 460, c.

Omulus's furly answer to Antoninus, 53, & seq. Onasimus's writings and character, 168, (X), 203, (A).

Onoulus murders Basiliscus, 515, b.

Opheltas gained over by Agathocles, 804, e. The fad condition of his army, 805, 2, b. Betrayed and murdered by him, 806, b, (U).

Oppian's admired poem and character, 129, (O). Statue, epitaph, &c. ibid. & seq.

Openeianus's writings, character, banishment, &c. 274, fub not.

Openius made a patrician, 272, a. Murdered by the foldiers, 275, a.

- a Donatist bishop, imprisoned for treason, 440, d. His death, ibid. e.

Optila, the murderer of Valentinian, 499, f.

Stratagem Orchanes invades the Greeks, 639, c, d. by which he takes Nice, 642, b, c.

Orestes insulted by the monks at Alexandria, 471. c, d. Raised by Nepas, 512, c. Revolts against him, ibid. d. His extract, &c. ibid. e, f. verns as tutor to his fon, 513, a. Disobliges the barbarians, ibid. c, d. Put to death, ibid. e.

Orfitus governor at Rome under Antoninus, 55, f. Oribasus's writings and character, 338, sub not. one of Faufina's gallants, promoted, 78, d. Orient, the district of, its several provinces, 60. 270,

c, d.

Origen's writings against Celsus, 81, (H). Great credit with the emperor's mother, 138, b, c. Letters to Philip and Severa, 166, c.

Origo, one of the antient names of Carthage, 721, f. And of Dido, 722, 8.

And of Dido, 722, a.

Orisso puts Hamilear to flight, 866, (M). Defeated by his son, 867, (N).

Orleans, by whom built, 194, e. Beneged by Attila, 494, f, & seq. Relieved by Ætims, 495, b.

Orosius's missake concerning the first treaty between Rome and Carthage, rectified, 774, a, b.

Orthodox savoured by Constantine, 248, d, e, 251, pass. Restored by Fovian, 344, d, e. Persecuted by Valens, 370, b, &c. Burnt alive, 382, a. Restored by Gratian, 389, a. By Theodosius, 393, e, f. Persecuted by Anassassius, 521, f, & seq. Restored by Justin, 523, b. Persecuted by the Persecuted by Tustin, 523, b. Persecuted by the Persecuted by Tustin, 523, b. Persecuted by the Persecuted by the Persecuted by Tustin, 523, b. stored by Justin, 523, b. Persecuted by the Persians, 541, c.

Osias, bishop, made Constantine's almoner, 244, d. His letter to him, 252, a.

Ofrhoene, where situate, 22, d. Subdued by Trajan, 10 X ibid. e. Reduced by Severus, 110, c. Seized by Caracalla, 127, b.

Ofrhoenians revolt against Maximin, 152, c, d. Ofrhoes's total defeat of the Romans, 63, e. Defeat and narrow escape, 64, b, c. Ostrogoths, who, 379, d. Where settled by Marcian, 496, b. Driven out of Illyricum, 506, e, f.

Oftrovi heads the Goths against Leo, 511, a. Othoman invades the Greek empire, 635, d, 639, c, d. His death, 641, e.

Ovinius Camillus's attempt on the empire, 139, f. How used by the emperor, 140, a, b. His death, ibid. c.

Ozogardene, Trajan's tribunal at, 21, b.

P,

Acorus joins with the Dacians, 11, d. Pacurianus's fingular friendship for the Comneni, 608, d, 610, c. Defeated by the Scythians, 611, d, c.

Paanius's Greek version of Ammianus, 386, sub not. Paganism suppressed by Gratian, 396, e, f. Whence io named, 403, f. Suppressed by Theodosius, ibid. & seq. Restored by Eugenius, 423, e. Laws against it revoked, 460, d. Renewed, 471, e, f. Pagans at Alexandria massicre the christians, 416, d-f. Laws against them, 471, e, f.

Paleologus's timely zeal for A. Comnenus, 608, e. Noble defence of Dyrrhachium, 610, a.

Michael's success against the Servii, 619, & feq. Goes over to the Turks, 631, a. Recalled, ibid. c. Declared guardian, 632, e. Proclaimed emperor, ibid. f. Vain attempt on Pera, 633, a. Grand entry into Conflantinople, ibid. d, f. Cruelty to the young emperor, 634, d. Defeated by the Bulgarians, ibid. e. Submits to the pope for quietness sike, ibid. f. Crueity to the recusants, 635, a. Excommunicated for the Sicilian maffacre, ibid. His death, ibid. b.

Andronicus shakes off the pope's supremacy, 635, b. Cruety to his brother Conflantine, &c. ibid. c. Defeated by the Turks, ibid. f. Marches against them, 636, f, & seq. Defeated by them, 637, a, b. Faral fundness for his worthless grandfon, 638, pail. Makes him his collegue, 639, b. Fails out with him, ibid. d, e. Makes peace with him, 640, paff. Surprised and deposed by him, 641, 2-c. Retires and dies, 642, d.

- his grancion's wretched character, 638, c. Public submission. ibid. e, f. Escape, 639, a. Obtains haif of the empire, ibid. b. Falls in and out with the emperor, ibid. & feq. Stratagem against his uncle, 639, e, f. Treachery to his grandfather, 640, a, b. Seizes on several of his provinces, ibid. c—e. Prepares to besiege Conflantinople, ibid. f. Takes it by surprize, 641, a. Deposes his grandfather, ibid. b, c. Success against the Bulgarians, ibid. d. Wounded and defeated by the Turks, ibid. & feq. His death and character, 642, e, f, & seq.

John, the fon of Andronicus, 643, a. Severity to his two fons, 645, f, & feq. Imprisoned, 646, 2. Restored, ibid. b. Dies, ibid. c.

Andronicus, the son of John, his treason and punishment, 645, f, & seq. Escape and revenge, 646, a. Obtains Selymbria for his retreat, ibid.

- John, his fon's treaty with Bajazes, 646, f, & feq. Crowned, 647, 0, c. pranting.

Folm, the fon of Manuel, crowned, 648, a.

Florence, 640, a. His death, Goes to the council of Florence, 649, a. His death,

- Constantine, his embassy to Mohammed II. 649, c. Revives the union of the Greek and Latin churches, 650, a, b. Invaded by Mohammed, ibid, b, c. Belieged, ibid, d. Offers of peace and tribute rejected, 651, f, & seq. Brave and pious desence, 652, d-f. Death, 653.

Palelogus Philes begs to head the army against the Turks, 637, d. Surprifes and defeats them, ibid, e, f. Cuts them all off, 638, pass.

Palestine newly divided, 372, d. Insested with grashoppers, 453, b, c. By the Bulgarians, 520, 2, b. Subdued by the Saracens, 543, f.

Palfurnius taken and put to death, 201, b. Palici at Carthage, their worship, 695, b.

Palladius's writings and character, 273, sub not. - treachery to Valentinian, 349, d, e. Hangs himself, 358, e.

- incredible 700 miles journey in three days, 474, d.

- the son of Maximus, chosen Casar, 500, c. Marries Eudoxia's daughter, ibid. e.

Pallantium, why made a free city, 56, c.

Pallas, the palace of, burnt, 92, b. Palma chosen consul, 9, a. Success in Arabia, 16, a. Put to death by Adrian, 34, c.

Palmyra besieged by Aurelian, 190, e, f. Surrender-ed, 191, d. Revolts, and is put to the sword, Pamphilus put to death, 537, f. Pamphylia visited by Adrian, 36, a.

Pancratius, a lying astrologer, his death, 558, d. Pandetti of Justinian, 530.

Panettenion, the temple of, at Athens, 42, d. Pannonia Secunda, why fo called, 211, a. Invaded by the Sarmatians, 299, e.

Panormitan coins, some account of, 703, b, (H). Panormus taken by the Romans, 843, d. Whence so called, ibid. (X).

Pantheon destroyed by lightning, 19, f. Rebuilt by Adrian, 46, d, & feq.

Papian law repealed, 256, d.

Papinian, a prime minister, his character, 117, b, c. Discharged by Caracalla, 122, b. Noble answer to him, 124, a. Put to death for it, ibid. b.

- chosen emperor in Pannonia, 167, a. His death, ibid.

Pappus's writings and character, 430, fub not.

Paris sues for Valens's protection, 370, e, 373, b, c. Put to death, 376, d-f. - the city of, where first situate, 302, c. Taken by Childeric, 508, a. Made a metropolis by Clovis, 521, E. Parnassus banished, 305, f.

Parricide, the law against, revived by Constantine, 256, b.

Parthamasiris made king of Armenia, 16, f, & seq. Letter to Trajan, 17, e, f. Submission and speech to him, ibid. & seq. Deposition and death, 18, c. Parthamasphases made king of Parthia, 24, c. Driven out of it, 25, 2.

Parthenius killed by the mutineers, 5, c.

Parthians invaded by Trajan, 16, f, & seq. Subdued, 17, & feq. 20, & feq. Continue faithful to him, 24, c, d. Revolt, 25, a. Recal Cofrhees, 33, e. Great regard for Antoninus, 56, f. War against the Romans, 63, & feq. Defeated, 64, c, 65, b, c. Invade Mesoporamia, 113, t. War against Macrinus, 131, b, c. Subdued by the Persians, 139, d.

Pasiphilus surprises Messana, 791, 2. Paliphus's furpriting constancy on the rack, 374, f. Pataici at Carthage, what, 695, a. Paternus deteats the Germans, 80, c,

- Tarruncius put to death by Commodus, 88,

Patibulum, whether the same with crux, 726, (F). Patricians, their dignity, 271, f, & feq. Patricius burnt for magic, 375, a.

- the ion of Aspar, marries Leo's daughter, 510, d. Narrowly escapes death, ibid. f. Defeated by the Persians, 520, d, e.
Patzinacs, v.ho, 600, a. Defeated by the Romans, ib.b.

INDEX.

Pavia taken and burnt by Attila, 497, a. Pavium overturned by an earthquake, 566, b. Paul, St. church of, at Rome, by whom built, 407, Paulina's death and obscure funeral, 38, f. Paulinian family converted to christianity, 415, d. Paulinus, bishop, banished by Constantius, 289, b, c. Eudocia's favourite, why put to death, 485, Paulus of Tyre favoured by Adrian, 51, fub not.

Made councellor to Papianus, 117, c. To Alexander, 138.

— Jul. recalled and promoted, 139.

— the founder of the Eremetic life, 169, 2. bishop of Constantinople, banished, 266, d. Catena, a cruel informer, 288, d, e. Cruelties in Palestine, ibid. f, 305, e, f. Burnt alive, - count, governor in Gaul, 507, f. exarch of Ravenna, excommunicated, 552, e. Murdered, 553, a. Pausanias's history criticised, 83, & seq. sub not.
the sophist, an account of, ibid. Peace, the famed temple of, at Rome, burnt, 92. a, b. Peloponnesus, the ishmus of, shut up, 180, c. Ravaged by Genseric, 508, c. Pemenes put to death, 296, b. Pentacontalitra, a Sicilian coin, whence so called, 735, e, (C). Pentadia, wife of Timafus, refuges into a church, 437, C. Pentapolitans oppose the iconoclasts, 553, a. When and how they became subject to the pope, ibid. c, 554, a, 556, d. Pepin presents Ravenna to the pope, 556, d. Perennis, Commodus's chief favourite, put to death, 88, e. His character and crime, 89, a, b. Pergamus disfranchised by Macrinus, 132, a. Taken by the Saracens, 551, b. A just punishment for their horrid witcheries, ibid. c. Perinthus, the battle of, gained by Niger, 108, e. Periscus, a samous engineer at Byzantium, 111, a. Saved from the common flaughter, ibid. c. Peronia, the betrayer of Constantina, 537, f. Perozes defeated by the Romans, 524, c.
Persarmenians deseated by the Romans, 524, c, s.
Submit to them under Justin II. 532, a, b.
Persians threaten the Roman territories, 160, d. Deteated by Balista, 177, b, c. Invade them afresh, 275, d. Abandon them, 276, a. Defeated by them, 278, d, e. Before Nifibis, 279, b-d. Renew the war against them, 474, pass. Defeated by Ardaburius, ibid. & feq Make peace, 475, d. Invade them anew, 486, e, f. And make a new peace, 487, a. Renew the war, 523, & feq. Defeated, 524, d, e. Defeated in Syria, 525, b, c. Outwitted before Martyropolis, ibid. d, e. Conclude a perpetual peace, ibid. e, f. 4,000 defeat ciude a perpetual peace, ibid. e, 1. 4,000 uciele. 30,000 Romans, 527, f, & feq. Defeated by the Lazians, 528, d, e. Invade Lazian, 529, a. Defeated, ibid. c. Ravaged by Justinian, 533, b. By Mauritius, ibid. & feq. By Heraclius, 534, c, d. By Germanus and Philippicus, ibid. & feq. By Hsraclius, 540, & scq. End of their kingdom, 542, f. Court the Romans, 568, d. Persinan's success in Pannonia, 69, d. Promoted by M. Aurelius, ibid. e. Success in Illyricum, 78, c, d. In Britain, 89, f. Narrow escape, 90. Succeeds Dionysius at Rome, 91, d. Made proconsul of Afric, ibid. f. And governor of Rome, 92, c. Obsequies of Commodus, 94, a. Proclaimed emperor, 95, pass. Speech to the senate, 96, b, c. Rise and extract, ibid. e, f. Character and excellear administration, 97, & seq. Disobliges Latus and the army, 98, b, c. His intrepidity, ibid. e, s. Death, 99, a. Funeral honours, &c. ibid. b, Pompous apotheofis by Severus, 108, a.

Persinax Hecotus the son, his biting farcasm against Caracalla, 124, d. Put to death for it, ibid. e. Petavia destroyed by the Quadi, 388, c. Peter tortured to death by Honorius, 456, d. a frier, stirs up the mob against Hypatia, made duke of Naples, 553, b. ordered over the Danube, 536, b. Put to death by Phocas, ibid. e. the hermit, stirs up the christians to the holy war, 613, d. e. Goes at the head of it, 614, His ill conduct, ibid. c. And defeat, 615, a. Put to death by Theodorus, 630, 2.

Petra, metropolis of Palestina Tertia, 372, c. besieged and abandoned by the Lazians, b, c. Taken and dismantled by Bessas, ibid. 528, b, c. Petronius encourages Nerva to the purple, 2, e. Killed by the mutineers, 5, c.

Mamercus put to death by Commodus, 91, e. - extortions at Constantinople, 366, e. Peutinger's itinerary, 478, fub not. Phalangius, a bloody governor of Batica, 357, b.
Phalanz revived by Alex. Severus, 142, b. The bravery and reward of fix of them, ibid. b, c. Pharasmenes ravages Armenia, 41, e. Comes to Rome, 43, a. Kind reception from Adrian, ibid. b. Great respect for Antoninus, 56, f. Phasis, river, Arrian's observations on it, 42, a. Phenice subdued by the Saracens, 544, d. Phidemon's fidelity to Trajan, 25, c, d. Phidisia at Carthage, what, 680, (M). Philadelphia belieged by the Turks, 636, a. Philani worshipped at Carthage, 692, c. The reafon of it, 737, c. Philanorum ara, their distance from Hercules's pillars, 664, (1). Philanthropenus's fuccess against the Turks, 635, c. Revolts, ibid. d. Betrayed and punished, ibid. e. Philas, the castie of, why and by whom built, 213, Philinus's writings and character, 709, b. Philip Julius's treachery to Misitheus, 163, c. ceeds him as captain of the guards, ibid. c. Trea-chery to Gordian, ibid. e, f. His extract, 165, a. Whether the first christian emperor, ibid. b, c. Acknowledged by the fenate, ibid. d, e. Makes peace with Sapor, 166, a. Submission to the bishop of Antioch, ibid. b, c. Success against the Carpi, ibid. d. Edict against catamites, ibid. & seq. Marches against Decius, 167, c. Defeated and killed, ibid. d. His zeal for christianity, ibid. & seq. - his son, chosen collegue, 165, e. Consul, 166, e. Killed by the prætorian guards, 167, d. His singular gravity, ibid. e. Christianity, ibid. f. - Flavius, an Arian, conful, 278, a. emperor of Germany's treaty to inthrone Alexius III. 625, c, d. - of Sida, his voluminous works loft, 492, fub not. Philippicus's fuccess against the Persians, 534, c. Put to flight by Cardariga, ibid. d. Recalled, ibid. Sent back and repulsed by the army, ibid. e. Reconciled and victorious, ibid. & feq. Banished by Tiberius, 548, d. Proclaimed emperor, 549, e. Marches to Constantinople, ibid. f. Favours the Monothelites, 550, a. Blinded and deposed, ibid. c. Philippopolis taken by the Goths, 169, c. Romans put to the sword in it, ibid. c. Philosophers caressed by Julian, 326, b, c. Philostorgius's writings and character, 491, (S) Philostratus's writings and character, 121, sub not. Philislus's shameful advice to Dionysius, 753, b. His character, ibid. (E). Phlegon's account of two strange births, 26, e. account of his works, 49, sub not. Story of an apparition, ibid.

Phocas declared and crowned emperor, 536, b. Cruelty to Mauritius, ibid. c. And to his friends, ibid. d. His image fent to Rome, ibid. f. Character, 537, a. Calamities of his reign, ibid. b. Treachery to Narses, ibid. d. Horrid butcheries, ibid. & seq. 538, c. Insulted and conspired against, ibid. f. Butchered by Heraelius, 539, 2, b. Phocian's war with the Carthaginians, 731, b, c. Phosphorius killed by the Persians, 334, d. Photinians suppressed by Gratian, 389, a. Photinus's revenge on Phocus, 539, a. Photius's treachery and deposition, 574, e.
Phrygia adorned by Adrian, 36, a. Destroyed by samine, 372, b, c. Phrynicus's writings, &c. 83, Sub not, 94. (I). Phylicians fees from the poor regulated, 354, b. Pia and Pialia, the games of, 57, d.
Picts, who, and where fited, 232, c. Defeated by Constantius, ibid. d. Join with the Scots, 308, c. Invade North Britain, 400, c. Pietas Eusebia, the diocese of, by whom founded, Piri, the fortifications of, demolished, 355, b. Piscenian family persecuted by Severus, 110, b.
Piso sent against Valens, 179, c. Takes the imperial title, ibid. Murdered, ibid. d. His extract, divine honours, &c. ibid. & feq. Pissamina, the mother of Latus, her extraordinary charity, 399, b. During the siege of Rome, 458, Pithecuse, the cities of, whence so called, 809, (A). Taken by Eumachus, ibid. b. Pitholaus left in care of young Commodus, 69, 2. Placidia, the mother of Valentinian II. born, 391, 3. Consents to Serena's death, 458, e. Carried captive by Alaric, 465, b. Married to Ataulphus, 469, d, (P). Ill used by Sigeric, 471, a. Sent back to Honorius, 472, a. Married to Constantius, ibid. b, c. Retires to Theodofius's court, 475, e, f. Restored to her former titles, &c. 479, b, c. Returns to the west with her son, ibid. d. Declared regent, 480, a. Instigated by Felix against Bonifacius, ibid. e, f. Invites him into Italy, 482, Reconciled to him, ibid, e, f. Carried captive by Genseric, 501, c. - daughter of Eudoxia, married to Olybrius, 507, c. Placilla, the wife of Theodosus. See Flacilla, 390, Plague, a grievous one, brought into Italy, 66, a, b. Under Constantine IV. Under Gratian, 382, d. 555, b, c. Plantianus seizes Pescennius's children, 106, f. Brings them to him, 108, d. His character, wealth, and fway, 115, d—f. Consuithip, 115, a. Immense dowry to his daughter, ibid. b, c. Becomes obnoxious to the emperor, ibid. d. Accused of treason, ibid. e. Put to death, ibid. f. Plautilla Nerva's mother's descent, 2, a. - the daughter of Plantianus, married to Caracalla, 116, a. Becomes hateful to him, ibid. d, e. Banished into Liparis, 117, a. Put to death by her husband, 122, b. Plantins put to death by Caracalla, 122, b. Players forbid by Trajan, 10, a. Recalled, 12, d. Regulated by Valentinian's law, 357, d. Pleaders deprived of their fees, 13, b. Plinthia's revolt and rife, 473, a. Pliny's panegyric on Trajan, 11, 2, b. Speech against lawyers fees, 13, b. Sent governor into Pontus, ibid. c. His writings and character, 29, Sub not. Character of Suetonius, 51, Sub not. Plotina, Trajan's wife, her excellent character, 9, c. Raises Adrian to the empire, 25, e, f. Obsequies of her husband, 35, c. Death and funeral honours, 36, d. Plotinus goes voluntier to the Persian war, 163, c. His writings and character, 196, & seq. sub not.

Plutarch cotemporary with Favorinus, 49, fub not. Account of him and his works, 50, fub not. Polemon, an arrogant sophist under Adrian, 51, sub not. Buries himself alive, ibid. His ill manners to Antoninus, how requited, 53, d, e. Pollenius put to death for subornation, 117, f. Pollensia, the famed battle of, 450, b-d. Pollorius, an extraordinary youth, fam., 384, b.
Pollio Trebel. his history fadly curtailed, 178, d—f, & feq. Writings and character, 220, (C).
Pollux Jul. his writings, &c. 94, (I). Polyanus's writings, &c. 83, sub not. Pompeianus Claud. Vide Claudius, 68, c. - Ruricius defeated at Verena, 245, d, e. Pompeiopolis relieved by Balista, 177, b. Pompeius defeated by the Geta, 522, c. Put to death for treason, 526, b, c. Pempey's tomb repaired by Adrian, 37, c. theatre burnt, 166, e. Ponsiff of Alexandria, who, 37, f. Pontine marshes, Trajan's causway over, 16, d. Pontus ravaged by the Scythians, 175, 2. Popes, their power, how founded, 553, d, f. By whom granted, 556, d, e.
Porphyry's writing and character, 196, & feq. fub not. Extract, travels, &c. 222, sub not. Death and works, 223, & seq. sub not. Why an enemy to the christians, ibid. Wild notion about Daniel's prophecies, 224, sub not. Portucal, where fited, 503, c. Posthumius's success against the Gauls, 173, d. Proclaimed emperor there, 176, b - d. Success against the Germans, ibid. Excellent character and government, ibid. e, f. Beloved by the Gauls, 181, b. Repulses Gallienus, ibid. c, 182, d. Killed by his foldiers, 183, f. Prafecti pratorio, their office, 270, b. Province, ibid. & feq. By whom founded, 271, d. Pratextatus made prefect of Achaia, 327, a. His rise and excellent character, 405, d-f. Oration in the capitol, 406, a. Funeral honours, ibid. b. Pratorian guards discarded by Severus, 106, f, & seq.
A new set chosen, 108. Their tyranny, 246, d.
Disbandment by Conflantine, 247, a. Prators at Carthage, their office, 678, a. Praxagoras's writings and character, 272, (F). Prion, whence so called, 863, (1). Prisca, the wife of Dioclesian, a christian, 206, c. Priscianus accused of treason, 56, d. Kills himself, ibid. Priscus Murius condemned for extortion, 10, d. - Statius's fuccels in Syria, 64, & leq. Philip's brother, made governor of Syria, 166, c. His extortions cause a revolt, 167, a. Proclaims himself emperor, ibid. c. Proscribed, a philosopher, in favour of Julian, 326, c. His writings and character, 340, fub not. Killed by the Goths, ibid. affifted in his history by Euphemius, 492, - Mauritius's general, repulsed by the army, 534, d. Destroys 30,000 Avari, 536, a. Conspires against Phocas, 538, c, d. Proba, the wife of Probus, her excellent character, 364, 2. opens Rome's gates to the Goths, 464, b.

Probinus cholen conful by Theodofius, 425, f, & feq. Probus Babius banished for extortion, 10, f. - marries Severus's daughter, 108, c. fuccess against the Sarmatians, &c. 173, f. Defeated in Egypt, 187, c. Proclaimed emperor, 199, f. His extract, character, &c. 200, a, b. Success against the Gauls, ibid. c. The Germans, ibid. d. In Thrace, 201, b. Egypt, ibid. c. Triumph at Rome, ibid. e. Success against the revolters, 202, pass. Works, 203, b. Murdered by the soldiers, ibid. c. Epitaph and character, ibid. d.

Probas, governor of Illyricam, a rank coward, 361, b. Extortions discovered to the emperor, 363, c. His character and descent, ibid. d, e. Death, ibid. & feq.

Procheiron, what, and by whom written, 577, b, c. Procins diffundes the adoption of Cofriees, 523, c. Procepies crowned empress, 562. Banished by Lee, 563, d, c.

fo3, d, c.

Procopius presented with the purple by Julian, 330,
f. Brings a supply of provisions to Jovian, 342,
f. Sent with Julian's corpse to Tursus, 343, a.

Disappears, ibid. b. Revolts, 350, & seq. Concealed by Strategius, 360, d. Declared emperor at Constantinople, ibid. e, s. His success, 367, a,
b. Tyranny, ibid. d, e. Forsaken by his troops, 368, a, b. Beheaded, ibid. c. His rise and character, ibid. & feq.

an upright judge of Thinafus, 436, e, f. Bravery against the Persians, 475, d. Betrayed by Barchabbas, 468, b, c.

Proceedings, their number and office, 271, a.

Proceedings, his writings and character, 84, fish not.

rife and revolt in Gand, 202, b. Defeat and death, ibid. d, e.

- deposed for extortion, 403, b.

- the for of Thisms, put to death for the fame crime, 421, d-f.

Proereses, a christian sophist, his writings and character, 338, sub not.

Profuturas tem against the Gants in Thrace, 381, e. Defeated, ibid. & feq. His writings and character, 476, (R).

Promotas's success against the Greathongs, 407, b.
Sent against Maximus, 412, f. Saves Theodosius from the barbarians, 419, 2, b. His death, ibid. c. d.

Proferpine worthipped at Carthage, 679, b, c, 689, c. her temple plundered by Hamileo, 764, a. Prosper, an extortionate faccessor of Ursaicus, 292, c. 206, c.

Profitmes forced to pay a tax, 518, b. Banished by Theophylas, 570, c. Proterns, an orthodox bifthop, murdered by the Enty-chians, 504, c. Protopaschites suppressed, 469, c. Provinces, how far regulared by Adrian, 48, b, c. Prudentius's character of Maxentius, 242, b.

By Orchanes, Prusa taken by the Sopthiams, 174, c. 639, c, d.

Prolemens Cheanas's writings and character, 51, fub the aftrologer, his writings, &c. 60, sub not.

Padens, at thirteen years of age, wins the prize of poetry, 16, b.

Pulcherin, the daughter of Theodofius, born, 390, f.

Her death and character, 406, e, f.

- daughter of Arcados, her character, 455, a. Takes the administration upon her, 470, c. Her fignal piety, ibid. Marries her fon to Endocin, 473,

a. Her death and character, 493, e, f.

fifter of Theodofius, her firstagem to make min read what he figned, 490, e. Reigns after his death, 492, a. Marries Marcianus, ibid. & feq. Her death, gifts, &c. 496, d.

Punic tongue allied to the Hebrew, 697, & feq. past. Its numbers of the fame nature, 700.

Pufens furrenders Annathun, 332.

Puteoli, the games of, inflituted, 57, d.

Puteoli, the games of, inflituted, 57, d.

Putionus chosen emperor by the feaste, 176, e, f. His mean extract and rife, ibid. & seq. Excellent character, 197, a, b. Marches against the Maximins, ibid. f, & feq. Quickly returns to Rome, 159, c. Fills it with atmost joy, ibid. f, & feq. Infulted by the preversion guards, 160, f, & feq. Killed by them, 161, b.

Pygmalion murders Sicham, 719, e. Over-reached by Dido, 720, b, c. Vol. VI. Nº 12.

Pylindes, an excellent gladiator, 12, d.

Pyrrhus, the worthless patriarch of Conflaminople, 444,

c. Flees into Afric, ibid. Betrays Ansions to the christians, 615, f.

king of Epirus, invited by the Syracusians 814, b. Quick progress in Sicily, 815, c-e. Parced to abandon Isaly, 816, a-c. Prophetic farewell to it, ibid. d.

Pyrus taken by the Borani, 174, c.

Underna taken by Maximas, 412, e. Anadi submit to Antonimus, 56, f. Revolt against M. Aurel. 66, b, c. Descared, ibid. f. Driren out of Pannonia, 69, c, d. Over-reach the Roman, 71, a, b. Deftroyed by a miraculous fire, ibid. & feq. Sue for peace, 73, a. Break it, ibid. b. Detested and punished, ibid. c, d. Defeated by Probas, 173, f. By Regilliamus, 175, b. Invade Pannonia, 296, c, 303, b. And Illyrieum, 361, d, c. Defeat the Romans, 362, b, c. Water their country, 288, a, b. their country, 388, a, b. Quadrasus's apology for the christians, 48, e.

Quadriremes first invented by the Carshaginians, 710, a, b.

Quadruplatores, informers, why fo called, 131, f. Quartinus chosen emperor, 152, c. Betrayed and murdered, ibid. d.

Questors at Carthage, their office, &c. 678, b, c. Quietus, the son of Macrianus, chosen tribune, 178, a. Left in Syria, 180, e. Killed by the Emeffans, ibid. f.

Quintilim wounds Commodus, 88, a.

Dainquegentiani, whence so called, 209, c. Overrun Afric, ibid. d, & feq. Defeated by Maximian, 211. b.

Quinqueremes, by whom invented, 755, a. Quinquevirate at Carthage, what, 676.

Quintili, the two brothers, their confulfhip and high character, 98, c, d. Put to death by Commodus, Quincilius Planeiumus put to death by Severus, 117, č.

- Marcellus, one of Alexander's counsellors,

Quintilius, the brother of Claudius, prochimed emperor, 187, f. His death, ibid.

Saintinus defeated by the Franks, 413, d. c.
Saintinus Carrine's anachronism about the Tyrians embaffy, rectified, 787, d.

R.

Radagaifus, king of the Hunns, invades the Romans, 447, f, & feq. His fecond formidable invalion, 452, b—d. Defeated before Florence, hid. & feq. Taken and put to death, 453, b.

Ram, battering, described, 750, (O).
Ramizjus ravages Palestine, 539, e.
Ravenna becomes the seat of the western empire.

452, a. Described, ibid. (N). Taken by Theodo-553, c, 554, a. The exarchate of, ibid. & feq. its extent, 556, d. Given to pope Stephen III. ibid.

Valentinian's tomb at, 500, a.

Rauracum, where fitted, 290, d. The battle of, ibid.

Raufunedes defeated and killed, 257, a, b.

Raymond fucceeds Gualtier in the crustade, 615, a. Razaffes, a Persan general, defeated and killed by Heraclius, 541, c, f.

Reams put to death by Heliogabalus, 136, 2. Rebaptizers suppressed by Grasian, 391, c. By Theadojins H. 469, f.

Rechilus's 10 Y

Rechilus's success in Spain, 488, f. Death, 489, c. Retters among the Romans, their office, 271, b.
Regillianus's fuccess against the Sarmatians, 175, b.
Proclaimed emperor, ibid. e. His extract and rife, ibid. f, & seq. Murdered, 176, a.
Regillus put to death by Commodus, 91, d. Regium, an imperial palace near Constantinople, 427, f, & leq. Regulus Astilius's success against the Carthaginians, 835, & seq. Ravages Afric, 837, a, b. Kills a monstrous serpent, ibid. d. Defeats the Carthaginians, 838. b, c. High demands upon them, ibid. f, &t seq. Defeated by Xantippus, 839, d, e. Taken prisoner, 840, b. Cruel treatment from the Carthaginians, ibid. c, d. Dismal end, 841, & seq. His widow's bloody revenge, 842, b, c, & (W). Religious war, the first waged by the christians, 250, Reman furrendered to Sapor, 307, 2.
Remigius's extortions under Valentinian, 349, b, c. Strangles himfelf, 358, d, e. Remismend wastes Orenzo in Spain, 506, c. Makes peace with Theodoric, 507, e. Remphan, some conjectures concerning that deity, 682, & feq. (P). Requiarius's success in Spain, 489, e, f, & seq. Ravages Carthagena and Tarraco, 503, a, b. feated and put to death, ibid. c. Resmagas's interview with Adrian, 37, 2. Reciarium taken by Attila, 488, b. Reverendus, a vile minister of Gordian, discarded, 162, Rhando takes the city of Mentz, 353, a. Rhegians outwit the Carthaginians, 776, & seq.
Rhegium battered by Mago, 815, a. Seized by Decius, 820, e, f. Rhetia ravaged by the Franks, 175, 2, b. Makes peace with Constantius, 298, b, c. Invaded by the Suevians, 299, c. Rhetianus conspires against Caracalla, 128, e. Rhine fortified by Valentinian, 351, e, 355, 2. Rhodanes, bishop, banished, 298, c. Rhodanus burnt alive for extortion, 355, c. Rhodes, the colossus of, its first shake, 37, c. the city of, overturned by an earthquake, 59, 2. Restored by Antoninus, ibid. Conquered by the Saracens, 544, d. Plundered, 561, e.

Richomeres fent by Gratian against the Goths, 381,

e. Arrives at Valens's camp, 383, c. Tries in vain to make him stay for Gratian, 387, e, f. Success against the Saracens, 402, c. Consulfaip, extract, &c. 403, a, b. tract, Gr. 403, a, b.

Ricimer's success against Genseric, 503, d. His rise and character, ibid. e, f. Causes Avita to be deposed, ibid. f, & seq. And Majoranus to revolt, 404, e, & seq. Treachery to him, 406, d, e.
Raises Severus to the throne, ibid. e. Absolute sway during the inter-regnum, 508, a, b. Marries Anthemius's daughter, ibid. e. Revolts and hessers him in Rame, etc., h. Puts him to death. besieges him in Rome, 511, b. Puts him to death, ibid. c. His own death, ibid. d. Ricomer promoted by Theodosius, 392, c. Riotham, one of the kings of Britain, 400, f. defeated by Euric, 510, c.

Riverines, who and where fited, 495, b.

Rivers worshipped by the Carthaginians, &c. 691, & Robers crowned Latin emperor, 630, a, b. Defeated by John Ducas, ibid. c. His death, and the occasion of it, ibid. e, f. Robur, the fortress of, built, 361, d. Roche-saillee, the castle of, by whom built, 468, (O).
Roger, king of Sicily, wars with Manuel, 619, b.
Makes peace with him, ibid. d. Roman empire dismembered after Trajan's death, 25, b. And with other dreadful calamities, 26, e, f. By whom divided into provinces, 48, c, d. Under greater calamities, 180, b. Divided into four do minions, 210, a, b. Under six emperors, 236, f. Into four districts, 270, b. How parted by the three fons of Constantine, 275, c, d. United again under Constantine, 293, f. Under fad calamities in Julian's reign, 327, 2—c. Under a grievous famine, 397, c. Pestilence, 489, a. End put to it by Odoacer, 514, a, b. Roman Fortune, the temple of, built, 36, d. Destroyed, ibid. Remaria, whence so called, 452, 2 Romans forbid to follow the Gothic dress, 439, b. Their famine and distress in Spain, 462, e, f. mit to the barbarians, 463, a, b. Seized with a panic before Nilibis, 475, a, b. In Italy, revolt from nic before Nujois, 475, a, b. In Italy, revoit from Leo, 553, b. Submit to the pope as a temporal prince, ibid. c. Treaty with Carthage, 814, & feq. How early acquainted with failing, 823, (C). Their fleet shipwrecked, 843, a, b, &c. Under a famine and pessilence in Sicily, 845, c, d. Harassed before Lilybeam, 847, & feq. Treachery to the Carthaginians, 854, & seq. Romanus's extortions in Afric, 349, a, b, &cc. Gains over Palladius, ibid. d, e. Arrested by Theodofius, 358, e, 359, d. - defeats the Scenita in Palefline, 520, a. Put to death by Phocas, 538, a.

Zoe's general, his treason, 579, a, b. Cruelty to Leo, ibid. Takes the purple upon him, ibid. c. Allies with the Bulgarians, ibid. e. Outwitted and dethroned, 580, a, b. His banishment and death, ibid. d, e. the fou of Conflans, crowned, 580, f. Poifons his father, 581, d, e. His reign and character, 582, a, b. Success against the Saracens, ibid. ter, 582, a, b. d. Death, ibid. e. Jeath, 1010. c.

II. forced to marry Confiantine's daughter, 594, a. b. Ill fuccess against the Saracens, ibid. & feq. Works of pietr, 595, b. Death, ibid. c, d.

Diogenes. Vide sub Diogenes, 604, & feq.

Rome suffers by water, fire and famine, 58, f. Governed by two emperors, 62, f, & feq. Laid under water, 63, b, c. Under great calamities, 66, b. Especially a three years pessioner, 90, d. Fire and famine, ibid. e, s. Celebrates her millennium, 166, e. The walls of, repaired by Decius, 169, c. Suffers under a new pessionec, 180, b. Under Maxentius's tyranny, 241, d—f. Why disliked by Constantine, 263, a. In deep mourning for his death, 268, d. Under a famine, 406, c. Another caused by Gildo. 428, a. Greaty streightened by caused by Gildo, 438, a. Greatly streightened by Alaric, 458, a, b. Relieved at a vast expence, ibid. d, e. Blocked up afresh by him, 460, a. Submits to him, 461, b, c. Under a grievous famine, 462, f, 463, c. Taken and burnt by the Goths, 464, c—e. Entered and plundered by Genferic, 501, b, c. Besieged by Ricimer, 511, b. Covered with the cinders of mount Vesuvins, ibid. d. Submits to Odoncer, 513, f, & feq. Romals, the mother of Galerius, 210, c. Persuades him to persecute the christians, ibid. d. Remulianum, by whom so called, 210, d. Romalus, the fon of Maxentins, chosen conful, 237, Ronzarius, Ronzerius, revolts against the Greeks, 636, a, b. Put to death by Michael, ibid. c.
Ross invade the Romans, 580, b. Defeated by Bardas, 585, c. By Zeminisces, 586, c, d. By Monomachus, 598, b. Rostrate naves, whence so called, 831, (O) Rosdrudis taught Greek by Elizens, 557, d.
Rosas's defign against the Boisei, 487, c. Proud message to the Romans, ibid. Makes peace with them, ibid. His death, ibid. d. Rougas killed by lightning, 480, c. Rualdus's censure of Suetonius, 52, sub not. Rucata betrayed by the Donatifis, 359, c.

Rufinus escapes Conflantius's snare, 290, c, d.

Rufmus's

Rufinus's treachery to Commodus, 419, d. To Tatianus, &cc. 421, d. Made guardian to Arcadius, His rise and character, 431, a. Avarice and ambition, 432, 2, b. Cruelty to Lucianus, ibid.d, e. Sets the empire in a flame, 433, c, d. Sues to be the emperor's collegue, 434, c. Murdered by Gainas, ibid. Indignities offered to his corple, Rufus Tinn. his success against the Jews, 39, c, d. Razes Jerusalem, ibid. c, f.

- Veties put to death by Commodus, 88, d.

Volufius sent into Afric, 241, c. revolts against Philippiens, 550, c.
Rugula, the Hunn, assists Æsius, 482, f. Killed by lightning, 487, c.

Rumitalces's bravery at Nice, 367, a, b.
Ruritius sent into Afric, 349, d. Put to death, 350.

Ruselius's revolt, 606, d. Taken prisoner, ibid. New revolt, ibid. & seq. Sent in chains to Constantinople, 607, b.

na, where situate, 669, b. Rufticus Julius in great efteem with M. Aurelius, 61.

Rusilius's rife, writings and character, 476, (R). Itinerary, ibid. & feq.

CAbalarus, Valens, why so nicknamed, 367, b.

Sabaras, the Persian, ravages Asia, 540, d. Sabbatians suppressed, 469, c. Sabina married to Adrian, 11, b, 30, e. Ill used by him, 33, a. Her character, ibid. b. Death, 35, b. Sabinianus's revolt in Afric, 161, c. Defeated, ibid. f. - fucceeds Ursmicus in the east, 306, b. Treachery to him, 307, d, e. fuccels against the Oftrogoths, 515, f. De.

feated by Pisza, 521, 2, b.
Sabinus Fab. recalled from his government, 132, c. Chosen one of Alexander's counsellors, 138, d.

Killed by the mob, 154, b.
Saccophori, Manichees, Whence so called, 397, a.
Sacred cohort at Carthage, what, 797, (L).

Sacrifices. See Victims. Saes, the Persian. his treachery to Herachius, 540, b.

Flayed alive, ibid. c. Saguntines threatened by the Carthaginians, 868, & seq. Implore the Romans protection, 870, b, c.

Beneged, ibid. f, & seq. Saladin bribes Isaac against Barbaressa, 623, f. Salamis burnt by the Jews, 23, e.

Salia Flavius, an orthodox conful, 278, a.

fudden death, 374.

Salices, the battle of, 381, f, & feq.

Salii, who, and where fited, 303, e, f. Subdued by Julian, 304, 2, b.

Salone taken by Theodosius, 479, d.
Salonicus put to death by Posthumius, 176, c.
Salvianus's character of all the northern nations, 485,

Salvidienus's writings and character, 203, (A).
Saluft, a great favourite of fulian, 323, c. Made prefect of Gaul, ibid. f. Narrow escape, 334, d. Secundus, different from the former, 324, e. Made prefect of the east, ibid. Saves Maximus the philosopher from being mobbed, 339, sub not. Refuses the empire, 346, b, c. Promotes Valen-sinian's election, ibid. c. Resigns through old age,

- the stately palace of, burnt, 464, d. Samachus, Conftantine the Great's fool, 269, C. 6amaritan character, whether the same with the Phoenician, 701, & seq.

Samas, or the great city, taken and razed, 795, d, e. Samona's rife, and treachery to Lee, 576, a-d. Difgraced, ibid. f.

Sammonicus's writings, noble library, and death, 126, Samolasa taken by Heraclius, 541, b. Samuel defeated by the Romans, 591, e, f. Dies of grief, 597, a.

Sandarion left governor of Palmyra, 191, d. Murdered, 192, a.

Santabarenus's treachery to Lee, 573, e, f. Punishment, 574, d.

Sapor shamefully repulsed by Gordian, 161, & seq. Defeated, 163, e. Ravages the Roman empire, 174, a, b. Ill treatment of Valerian, ibid. e, f. New conquests, 176, f, & seq. Haughty message to Odenatus, 177, d, e. Repulsed and deseated by him, ibid. & seq. Embassy to Constantine, 264, f. him, ibid. & seq. Embassy to Constantine, 264, s. Repulsed before Nissis, 277, s. Defeated by Constantins, 278, c-e. Before Nisitis, 279, d, e. Proud demands on Constantins, 302, e, f. Renews the war against him, 306, & seq. Crucity to the Anidans, 307, c, d. Takes several cities, 308, b, c. Frighted back by ill omens, 314, c, d. First offers of peace rejected, 329, d, e. His second, 323, b. Falls suddenly on Julian's army, 334, a. Makes peace with Jovian, 341, f, & seq. Treachery to Arsaces, 372, c, f. Invades Armenia, 373, c. Descated by Valens, 374, a. His death and long reign, 404, s.

a Roman general, fent to suppress the heretics, 395, c. Saracens, whether subdued by Trajan, 22, e. Invade Mesopotamia, 289, c. Go over to the Persians, 329, e. Repulsed by the Goths, 387, f, & seq. Waste Egypt, Syria, &c. 467, c. Desperate panic under Alamundarus, 475, 2. Repulsed by Marcian, 498, b. Join themselves to Mobammed, 543, b. Success against the Romans, ibid, c—e. Switt conquests, ibid. & seq. Obtain a peace from Conflans II. 545, a. Cruel ravages in Afric, 546, a. In Sicily, ibid. Repulsed before Conflansinople, ibid. b. Make peace with Constantine III. ibid. c, d. Deseated in Syria, 548, d. Repulsed before Antaradus, ibid. Driven out of Amenia, ibid. d, e. Fresh invasion, 550, b. Deseated at sea, 559, a. Fresh invasion, 550, b. Descated at sea, 559, a. By Lee III. 557, a. Persecute the christians, ibid. b. Repulsed by Irene, ibid. d. Bought off by the Persians, ibid. e, &c. Repulsed in Cilicia, 559, b. Success against Irene, ibid. d, c. Against Nicephorus, 561, & seq. Defeated by Leo, 562, e, f. Settle in Crete, 566, b, c. Signal victory there, ibid. e, f. Seize on Sicily, 567, c, d, Defeated by Petrona, 572, a. By Basilius, 573, c, d. New conquests on the Romans, 575, e, s. Defeated by Heraclius, 576, b.—f, & seq. 581, a. In the east, 582, c, d, 584, a, b, 585, b.

Saragossa plundered by the Suevians, 489, c.

Sarbarazes repulsed before Chalcedon, 541, f, & seq. Revolts to Heraclius, ibid. & seq. Put to death by Cosphaes, 542, 2.

by Cofrhoes, 542, 2.

Sardica taken by Crumus, 562, 2.

Sardinia taken by Genferic, 507, 2. Reduced by Marcellims, 509, e. By Scipio, 824, b, c. Yielded to the Romans, 864, & feq.

Sarmatia submits to Trajan, 18, d.

Sarmatlaus defeated by Adrian, 39, b. War against M. Aurel. 66, b. Defeated, ibid. f. By Gordian, him, 264, b, c. Severely punished, ibid. d. Driven out by their own slaves, 265, 2, b. Settled by Conflantine, ibid. c. Restored and infranchised by Conflantine, 303, c, d. Deseated in Masia, 362, c. Sue for peace, 363, a. Cruelties in the Roman territories, 388, a, b. Cut off by Theodolius, 405, e.

games whence, 257, b.

Sarnabazas sent against Heraclius, 540, e. Deseated, Sarus fent against the Goths, 452, d. Against Con-flansine, 454, d. Repulled by him, ibid. c. Dif-obliges Alario, 463, f. Noble defence and death, Saturacius lays the Selavi under et bute; 557, e. Conspires against Irene, 559, e. Dies of grief, ibid. e, f.

made collegue with Nicephorus, 561, c. Narrow escape, 562, c. Retirement and death, ibid. d, e.

Saturn's inhuman worthip at Carehage, 679, x. The chief deity of that nation, 681, d, e. Whence the fable of his devouring his children, 682, 2, (O).

The fame with Melech, ibid. c, (P). Worshipped by other mations, 684, a, b, (Q).

Sacurninus Pomponius, his writings and character, 19, fob not.

Saverne where fited, 300, e. Rebuilt by Julian, ibid. Sand, a Gothish general, under Theodosius, 424, a.

a Pagan one, under Honorius, 450, c.
Sauromates's embassy to Trajan, 13, d. Driven from Iberia, 373, a. Reftored to one half of it, ibid. e. Saxons repulsed by Theodosus, 393, f. By Severus, 355, c, f, &t seq. Settle at Nantes, &c. 508. Scandinavia, the original country of the Lombards, 39t, d.

Scarlet, a fine dye among the Perfishs, 190, f. Scaurus, 2 grammarian, under Adrian, 52, in fin. not. Scenitz Arabs defeated, 519, f, & feq.

Schismatics suppressed by Constamine, 2 12, b. Scipio over-reached by Hamilton, 830, f. Success in Corsica, &c. 833, & seq. &(Q).

Sclavi join with the Avari, 535, e. Against Harraclius, $47, c. Defeated by Constans II. 544, f; &c feq. Leave Justinian in the lurch, $47, b, c. Cruelly punished by him, ibid. d.

Sclavoniu, whence to called, 545, z.

Scots irruption on the Romans, 308, e. Invade North Britain, 400, d, e.

Scudilio fent to fetch Gallus into Italy, 292, f. Works his fail, 293, d.

Scutarii among the Romans, which, 327, c. Scyrri defeated by Theodosius, 396, b. In Thrace, 459, e. In Corsica, &c. 833, & seq. &(C). Scythians invade the Romans, 110, e. Driven back by Rorms, ib invade Asia, 178, c. Desperate defence, 186, c, d. New invalion, 611, d. Total defeat, 622, 1. New war, ibid. d, e. Repulled before Adrianople, ibid. f, & feq. By John Comnagen. 618, a.

Scythopolis made the metropolis of Palesina Secunda,

Sen overflows in Gallienus's reign, 180, b. Sebastian, general of Julian, perfecutes the christians, 331, b. The orthodox, 354, c. Supplies fo-visa with provisions, 342, f. Sent against the Goths, 382, c. Success against them, 383, b, c.

- made collegue to Jovinns, 467, e. Murdered by Ataulphus, ibid. f.

Secular games under Antoninus, 58, b. Segesta taken by the Romans, 828, d. Whence so named, ibid. (K).

Seins Carns put to death by Heliogabalus, 136, e. Seleucia subdued by Trajan, 21, a. Demosissed by Cassus, 65, d. By Severus, $14, b. By Casus, 204, e. The samous port of, built, 277, e. Selinantines quarrel with the Egestimes, 737, & seq. Defeated by the Carthaginians, 738, f. Selinas taken by Hannibat, 741, & seq. Plumbered and razed, 742, paff.

- the temples of, plundered, ibid. d, e. Selymbria inclosed within Anastasias's long wall, $21, c. Noble desence against the Turks, 650, c, Taken, ibid. d.

Semmon taken prisoner by Probus, 200, f. Released by him, ibid. & seq.

Sempronius, a vile cunuch, made governor of Rome, 125, b. Revolt and death, 181, e, f.

Sextus Jul. revolts, 201, f. Defeated and put to death, 202, a, b. - the baft judge of Timafias, 436, f, & fcq.

Delivered up to Ciclins, and burifled, 445, d. Escapes to Confianthople, ibid. e, f.

Sense's partiality to their own body, 4, c, d. Ronours to Trajan, 21, 2, b, 22, f. Influenced in favour of Adrian, 46, pass 54, e. Honours to Antoninus, 55, 2, b. Flattery to M. Aurelius, 19, 2, b. To Commodus, 92, c. Fury against him after his death, 94, a, b. Acknowledge Pertinax, 96, b. And Inlimms, rot. Proferibe him, 106, d. Submiffion to Severus, 107, e. Hatted against Caracalla, 130, c. Acknowledge Macrinus, ibid. f. Resentment against Maximm, 194, b.d. (S). Applied to for a new emperor, 198, a, b. Chuse Tacinus, ibid. c, d. Restored by Consumins, 247, c, d. Embaffy to Theodofius for the atter of Vic-tory, 414, f. Converted to christianity, 415, d, e. of women, instituted by Hellogabaius, 136, Senseors honoured by Antoninas, 56, d. Forty put to death by Severus, 113, e. Forbid to live far from Rome, 302, c. How to be tried, 178, 2.

Senecio chosen consul, 9, 2 treaction to Confuntine, 254, d.

Senes, whence so called, 825, (D). Senimechus murdered in Gaul, 345, b. Sens, the fiege of, raifed, 298, d, e.

Sentius's bravery in Parthia, 18, f. Septimius's writings and character, 148, (Q).

Serapis, the temple of, demolished by Theodofins, 416, & leq. the flictie of, broken, 417, c.

Seras, an informing philosopher, executed, 3, c. Found innocent, 4, d.

Serona, the celebrated fifter of Theologias, 390, c. Married to Stilisho. 415, d. Plunders the flatue of Cylele; ibid. c. Put to death, 458, c.

Sereniamus delivers up Cingens, 367, d. Pur to death, ibid. His reason for surrendering that place, 268, f.

Sergius's sevole and death, $30, 2.

patriarch of Confiantinople, left printe minifter by Hernelius, 540, b.

governor of Sully, raifes a revolt, 551, d.
Serpents, a dangerous kind of, in Rumidia, 805, (S). Which live upon duft, ibid, ad fin. Of a monftrous fize, 837, (T).

Servianus's confulfhip and character, 17, b, c. cefs in Pannonia, ibid. Put to death by Trajan, ibid, d.

- fisill offices to Adrian, 30, e. Put to death, 44, b. Servii defeated, 618, a.

Sefforian eliurch built by Confantine, 248, f. Seven, some curious remarks on that number, 684, & seq. sub nor.

Severa, the wife of the empetor Philip, 165, a. A good christian, 167, f.

mother of Geasian; divorced, 352, d, e, & severianus made governot of Martdon, 166, c. Recalled, 167, b. the fon of Severus, pat to death, 253, e. - defeated and killed by the Germans, 350, e. Severimes totally defeated by the Parthians, 63, 4. Severus Com. inside governor of Syria, 33, e.

Talian first against the Jews, 39, e. Inds the war with them, ibid. & feet. Equity to the Bithynians, 44, d, f. grandion of M. Aserelius, born, 62, a. Comrendation of Peft. Nover, 90, b. Accused and acquitted, ibid. d, e. Sent into Hyricam, 91, f. Funeral honours to Commodus, 94, b. To Pertinax, 99, c. Becomes fulpetted, 102. Proclaimed racter, extract and rife, 103, ct foq. Proclaimed emperor by his troops, 105, b. Proferibed by the fenate, ibid. c. Refuses the copartnership with Julianas, 106, 2. Acknowledged by all, ibid. Reception of the hundred fenators, ibid. e. Difbands the prætorian guards, ibid. & feq. Entry into Romé, 107, c. Speech to the senate, ibid. & seq. Chuses a new prætorian guard, 108, c, d. Marches against Pesc. Niger, ibid. & seq. Deseats and kills him, 109, b—e, f. Cruelty to all his friends, 110, 2—c. Treachery to Albinus, 111, c, d. Damned piece of witchcraft, ibid. e, f. Marches against him, ibid. & seq. Cruelty to him and his relations, 112, & seq. Threatening letter to his relations, 112, & seq. Threatening letter to the senate, 113, c. Cruelty to them and others, ibid. d, e. Marches against the Parthians, ibid. f, & seq. Success against them, 114, b, c. Bassled before Atra, ibid. f, & seq. Expedition into Syria, Egypt, &c. 115, b, c. Edict against the christians and Jews, ibid. c. Partiality to Plautianus, 126 & seq. Batterne study above. tians and fews, total c. Fatiguity to Laminum, 116, & feq. Reforms fundry abuses, 117, c. Severity, cruelty and parsimony, bid. & feq. Expedition against the Britains, 118, & feq. Famous wall there described, ibid. f, & feq. Taken ill at Tork, 119, b. Behaviour to the parricide Cara-calla, ibid. e. Severity to his accomplices, 120, a. Last legacy and works, ibid. c. Death and funeral honours, ibid. & seq. Severus, one of Alexander's counsellors, 138, e. chosen Casar, 218, b. Why preferred to Constantine, 230, e. His extract and character, ibid. & seq. Share of the government, 231, c. Extortions in Italy, ibid. 233, d. Sent against Maxentius, ibid. e. Chosen consul, 234, d. Deferted by his troops, ibid. e. Imprisonment and death, ibid. & seq. · fucceeds Marcellus in Gaul, 299, 2. - stands candidate for the empire, 352, b. Goes into Germany, 354, d. Success there, 355, d—f. - Acilius's writings and character, 386, fub not. a priest, put to death by Theodosius, 486, b. - raised to the throne by Ricimer, 506, e. Confulfhip, ibid. f. Death, 508, a. Seville taken by Attila, 488, d. Sextus, the stoic, an account of, 82, sub not-- the Pyrrhonian, ibid. · Condianus put to death by Commodus, 88, Shibkah, among the Arabians, what, 668, (C). Sibyl books opened, 180, b. Answer to Maxentius, 246, c. Sicani go over to the Carthaginians, 759, & seq. Sicca Venerta. See Succoth Benoth, 697, a. Sicilia in Germany, where, 145, e.

Sicily visited by Adrian, 36, b. Infested with banditi, 180, 2. Submits to Constantius, 285, e. Plundered by the Vandals, 485. Ravaged by the Saracens, 546, a. Siculi assist Hannibal, 743, & seq. Discharged by him, 744, f. Desert Dionysius, 761, c. Siculo, Punic coin, explained, 703, pass.

Sigeric chosen king of the Goths, 470, f. Murders

Ataulphus's children, 471, a. Murdered, ibid. b.

Sigismond sent to assist Manuel, 646, d. Defeat and narrow escape, ibid. f. Sigifvult's fuccess against Bonifacius, 481, 2. Silentarii among the Romans, what, 517, d. Silenus's writings and character, 709, e. Simeon wars against the Romans, 574, e. Cruelty to them, ibid. & seq. New invasions, 577, & seq. Allies with Romanus, 579, e, f. 6imilis promoted by Adrian, 33, c. His character, ibid. &c. Religns and retires, 34, e. Simplicius banished, 305, f.

vicar of Rome, his cruelties there, 361. Put to death, 377, f.
Sinex's treachery and death, 481, a.
Singana taken by Sapor, 308, b. Demolished, ibid. c. Yielded to the Persians, 341, f, & seq. the famous battle of, 278, c-e. Sintula carries off part of Julian's forces, 309, & feq. Brings them back to him, 310, d. Vol. VI. Nº 12.

Sirmium burnt with lightning, 364, f. Taken by the Avari, 534, a. Siroes dethrones and murders his father, 542, a. Makes peace with Heraclins, ibid. b. Murdered by Barahanes, ibid. e. Sisibranum taken by Belissarius, 527, e. Sitana taken by the Romans, 833, c. Sittas defeated by the Persians, 523, d, e. Success against them, 524, e, f. Slaves forbid to inform against their masters, 3, c. Adrian's laws concerning them, 47, e. Their manumission facilitated by Constantine, 255, d. Encouraged by Honorius to take up arms, 453, c, d. 40,000 of them defert over to Alaric, 460, a. Smoke, the felling of, at Rome, what, 141, b. Its punishment, ibid. d. Smyrna repaired by M. Aurelius, 79, f. Socrates's writings and character, 491, (S). Soemis, the mother of Heliogabalus, 132, & feq. Her bravery, 133, f. Vile character, 134, f. Made pre-fident of a petticoat fenate, 136, c. Murdered, 137, b. Sohemus driven from his throne, 63, e. Restored by M. Verus, 65, 2. Soissons made a small kingdom, 507, f. Solicinium, where situate, 354, e. the battle of, ibid. d, e. Solyman's irruption into Thrace, 551, c. Death, ibid. - the fon of Cutlumofes, makes peace with Rome, 609, d. Attempts to fave Nice, 615, c-c. the successor of Orchades, invades Europe, 645, e, & feq. Sopater's writings and character, 274, sub not. Put to death, ibid. ad fin. Sopheme yielded to the Romans, 215. b. Where sited, ibid. c. Sophia, the empress, inspires Justin with cruelty, 531, f, & seq. Moving letter to Costhoes, 532, e. Cabals against Tiberius, 533, c. Deprived of her treasure for it, ibid. - St. the church of, built by Constantine, 316, b. By whom burnt, 414, d. Sophronia yielded to Maxentius, 241, d. Kills herself, ibid. e. Sosia, the metropolis of New Dacia, 195, a. Sosipater Char. his writings and character, 478, sub Sosifiratus deposed by the Syracusians, 788, e. Applies to the Carthaginians, ibid. f. Received again into Syracuse, 789, a, b. Sozomen's writings and character, 491, (S). Sozopetra destroyed by Theophylus, 569, e. Sozopolis taken by stratagem, 617, f.

Spain visited by Adrian, 35, d. Invaded by the Franks, 183, 2. Submits to Constantius, 285, e.

To the British Constantine, 455, d. e. Invaded by the Alans and barbarians, 462, d, e. Cruelly ravaged by them, ibid. e, f. How divided amongst them, ibid. & seq. Part of, subdued by Attila, 488, d. By the Goths and Suevians, 514, a. When first invaded by the Carthaginians, 729, & seq. Spalatro, the palace of, described, 218, d. Spaniards, brave foldiers, 731, a.
Sparta burnt by the Heruli, 184, d. Spartianus's writings and character, 220, (C). Spendius raises a tumult among the Carthaginian mercenaries, 854, a. Sent against Hamilcar, 859, c, d. Deseated by him, 860, b. Inflames his men against him, ibid. d, e. Seized, &c. by him, 862, e, f. Spendosthalbus makes peace with the Romans, 586, f, & feq. Spire taken by the Vandals, 453, f. Squiri, &c. settled in Scythia Minor, 496, b. Stabuli prafettus, his office, 346, b. Staquinsam's interview with Adrian, 37, a. Star, blazing, appears before Valentinian's death, 364, f. 10 Z Statius. Statius. See Priscus, 64, b, c, & seq. Statues, heathen, demolithed in Egypt, 417, pass. At Rome by the Goths, 464, f.

Stephen, a cruel minister of Justinian, 547, d, e. Burnt alive, 548, b.

- the fon of Basilius, turns monk, 573, a. Made patriarch of Constantinople, 574. e. - the fon of Romanus, crowned, 579, c.

over-reaches Basilius, 589, f, & leq. Stilicho's revenge on the Bastarna, 419, d. mands the Romans against Eugenius, 424, 2. Plunders fupiter's temple, 425, e, f. Made guardian to young Honorius, 430, f. His rise and character, 431, d. Avarice, ibid. & seq. Hatred against Rufinus, 432, b, c. Arrogates an unlimited power, 433, b. Makes peace with the Germans, ibid. e, f. Marches to Arcadius's affistance, 434, a. Stopped short by him, ibid. b. Sends him forces by Gainas, ibid. c. Defeats Alaric in Greece, 435, d. Suffers him to escape, ibid. d, e. Undermined by Eutropius, 436, a, b. Falls out with St. Ambrofe, 438, a. Preparations and success against Gildo, 439, & seq. Treachery to Mascezel, 440, e, f. 439, & fcq. Treachery to Mascezel, 440, e, t. Exploits in Britain, 441, b-d. Chosen conful, 445, b. Supposed to have stirred up Alaric, 449, b, c. Marches against him, 450, a, b. Makes peace with him, ibid. e, f. Success against Radagaifus, 451, & siq. Invites the northern nations into Gaul, 453, c, d. Holds private correspondence with Alarie, 455, f. Difgraced and put to death, 456, a. With all his friends after him, ibid. b, c. His character, ibid. c, d, 457, a. Estate nocfiscated, ibid. b.

Strasburgh taken by the Vandals, 453, f.

---- the battle of, 301, c.
Suburbanica provincia, what, 271, b. Suburbanus, Trajan's speech to, 7, d.

Succeth Benoth, probable conjectures concerning that deity, 697, a.

Sucidava, the pass of, taken by Julian, 313, d.

Suetonius difgraced by Adrian, 35, d. An account of him and his writings, 51, sub not.

of him and his writings, 51, 140 not.

Suevians invade Rhatia, 299, c. Enter Gaul, 453, d, e. Spain, 488, f. Submit to Theodoric, 503, b, among themselves, 505, c. Reconciled by him, ibid. c.

Suffetes at Carthage, their office, 674, & feq. (E), (F). Whence so called, 677, (1).

Sulpitianus Flav. brings up Pertinax's fon, 96, d. Sent to quell the prætorian troops, 98, d. His baseness to them, 99, d.
Sulpitius Apollinar. his writings and character, 60, fub not.

the Roman consul, reduces Sardinia, 834, &

Sun itrangely darkened in Gallienus's time, 180, b.

Worshipped at Carthage, 689, c. the famous temple of, consecrated, 194, c.

Sunday, work forbid on, 256, f. Suniator, a betrayer of his country, 679, (K), 773, f.

Sunieric's success in Lusuania, 506, d. Sanno makes peace with Stilicho, 433, c. His treachery to him punished, ibid. f. Suomarius sues for peace to Julian, 304, b.

Suthian repulsed before Constantinople, 551, d.

Suphianus defeated by Florus, 546, c.
Sura chosen consul, 12, e. His extract, character, Ge. ibid. f. A great confident of Trajan, ibid. & seq. His death, 13, 2. Sureta's notitia, when first published, 429, sub not. Susa taken by Trajan, 22, d. By Constantine, 245, Syagrus's escape and disgrace, 355, b. the fon of Agidius, king of Soiffons, 507, f. Syllanus joins with Gordian, 153, f. Sylvanus occasions a revolt in Gaul, 176, c. Put to death, ibid. d.

Sylvanus goes over to Confiantius, 284, 4. Betraved by Arbetio, 294, f. Takes the purple upon him, 295, c. Acquitted, ibid. d. Murdered, 296, a. His character, ibid. b, c.

Symmachus intercedes for the Cafareans, 359, c. Anfwer to Theodofus, 361, b. Sent to obtain the liberty of pagan worthip, 396, f. Repulfed, ibid. & feq. Bamished by Thredofins, 414, f. Recalled and promoted by him, 415, a, b. Sent by the heathens to Valentinian, 419, e. His writings and character, 427, (M). Extract and rife, 428, sub not.

Synadenus's fuccess against the rebel Andronicus, 639, e, f, & feq.

Syracusans war with the Carthaginians, 739, & seq. Defeat them at sea, 745, d, e. New preparations against them, 746, b. March to the relief of Agrigentum, 747, b. Beat the Carthaginians, ibid. d, e. Receive the fugitive Agrigentines, 749, b, c. Send Dionysius against Imilear, 750, a. Disarmed and enslaved by him, 754, 2, b, &c. Approve of his war against the Carthaginians, 755, b, c. Cruelty and injustice to them, ibid. d—f. Signal victory and rejoicings, 766, pass. Make peace with them, 789, b. Besseged by Hamilton, 793, & feq. Deceived by him into a belief of Agathocles's death, 799, c, d. Undeceived, and raise the fiege, ibid. f. Revenge on the Carthaginian general, 801, c, d. Receive fresh supplies from Aga-thocles, 810, c, f. Make peace with Carthage, 812, & seq. Divided between Thinyon and Sosisstatus, 814, a. Besieged by the Carthaginians, thid. b. Syracust plundered by the Saracens. 546, b. Taken by them, 573, d. The rest see under the preceding article.

Syrgiannes a wicked tool of Andronicus, 638, e, f. Forfaken by the Turks, 639, f. Syria invaded by Vologefes, 63, f. Sides with Coffins, 79, b. Forgiven by M. Aurelius, ibid. c. Thread ened by the Persians, 139, d, e, 141, e. Ravaged by Sapor, 176, f. By famine and pestilence, 264, e. Under Theodosius, 403, c. Invaded by the Goths, 433, d. Ravaged by the Persians, 526, e, & see, Subdued by the Saraceus, 543, e, f. Syria Dea Worshipped at Carthage, 691, b.

Syropheenicians, who, and whence, 673, & seq.

Acitus chosen consul, 4, e. His account of the Germans defeat, 8, e, f. His writings and character, 28, fub nor.

- chosen emperor by the senate, 198, b, c. His respect for the historian, ibid. f. His character, laws, &c. 199, a-c. Marches against the bar-barians, ibid. d. His death, ibid. e.

Taifales ravage Sarmatia, 303, d. Driven out by Athanaric, 380, c. Join with the Greathongi, Talicius's success against the Scythians, 611, d, e. Tamocosrhoes defeated by Mauritius, 533, e.

Tamsapor treats for peace with the Romans, 299, f,

Tancret the Norman, his rise and progeny, 609, e.

Tangripermes repulsed by Alexius, 616, c. Tangrolipix's fuccess against Mohammed, 598, f, & feq. Made king of Persia, 599, b. Ill success against the Arabians, ibid. c. Husting message to the emperor, ibid. f. Excursions into Iberia, 600, c, d.

Tarbigil. Vide Tribigil, 442, d. Tarentum betrayed by Milo to the Romans, 819, e, f. Taricha islands, where situate, 671, (E). Tarragona visited by Adrian, 35, d. stroyed by the Franks, 183, e.

Tarshish fometimes denotes Carthage, 722, 2. Tarfus taken and plundered by Sapor, 177, a.

figned for Julian's abode, 327, a. But is the place of his burial, 335, c, 343, a.
Tarrars success against the Turks, 630, d, 632, a, b, 634, & leq. Tarrefa often miltook for Gadir or Cadis, 730, in fin. (A). Tatian's character of the heathen philosophers, 81, d, & (H). Tasianus's friendship to Adrian, 25, f. Severe advice to him-rejected, 31, c. Promoted by him, 33. c. Made a fenator, 34, d, e.

Attil. banished for treason, 56, d. bravery in Syria, 64, b, c. Tasirius destroys the Cru sado sleet, 616, d.
Taurinus chosen emperor, 139, f. Flees, and drowns himself, ibid. &t leq.

Taurominium taken by the Savacens, 575, e, f. Yielded to Dissysus, 770, e.

Taurus banished by Julian, 325, d.

mount, where situate, 761, (L). Tausias shoots Persinax, 98, f. Taxes, Constantine's, regulations concerning, 256, e. Teichomerus betrayed and murdered, 596, f, & seq. Telemachus a hermit, stoned to death, 450, b. Telephus's writings and character, 60, sub not. Temple of ferusalem demolished and ploughed, 29,d,e. les materials used to build a heathen temple, 41, e. Temples, pagan, suppressed by Grazian, 396, e, f. For-faken under Theodosius, 415, d-f. Demolished under Arcadius, 444, e, f. Or turned into churches, 445, 2. Terence's writings and character, 710, (N). Terentius fent into Iberia, 373, d. - facrificed to the mutinous foldiers, 460, c. Terillus invites the Carthaginians into Sicily, 733, f. Terracina's port repaired by Antoninus, 56, c. Tortullian's judicious remarks on Trajan's persecution, 17, c. d. Tersullus, one of Faufina's gallants, promoted, 78,
d. Exposed by a mimic on the stage, ibid. e. Terruinga war against the Vandals, 209, C. Tetricus declared emperor in Gaul, 184, b. fices his army to M. Aurelius, 192, c, d. Led in triumph by him, ibid. e. Promoted, 193, c. his fon promoted by Aurelian, 193, c. His house described, ibid. d. Thala, where situate, 670, c. Thalassus's pride aggravates Gallus, 290, b. Thapfus, where lituate, 669, d. Thebais destroy'd by Dioclesian, 213, d.

Themistius the philosopher raised by Confiantius, 294, d. His flattery to him, ibid. c. Sent with a golden crown to him, 299, b. His reward and gratitude, ibid. c, d. Sent embassador to Gratian, 378, e. His worthless speech before the senate, ibid. f. Embasily to Theodosius from the Constantinopolitans, 392, c. Fitteenth oration addressed to him, 395 c. Extract, writings, and character, 429, Sub Thena, where situate, 670, a.

Theocritus a worthless flave, made captain of Caracalla's guards, 125, b. Defeatedin Armenia, 127, b.

executed for treason, 723, 2, b.
Theodomir, where settled with his Goths, 496, c. Invades the eastern empire, 511, e. His death, Theodora married to Constantius, 209, f, 226, e. -her magnanimity supports the frighted emperor Justinian, 526, a, b. Inclined to Eutychia*ni∫m*, 631, b.

widow of Theophilus takes the administration, 570, c. Severity to the Manichees, ibid. & Resigns, 571, b, c. Her death, ibid. d. Constantine's daughter raised to the imperial government, 597, d, e. Mounts the throne, 601, a, b. Her good, but short reign, ibid. b, c. Theodoret's centure on Porphyry, 223, & feq. fub not. Character of Julian, 335, & seq.

Theodoric fucceeds Vallia in Spain, 473, a. Besieged by Litorius, 484, c. Takes him prisoner, ibid. d. Makes peace with the Romans, ibid. e, f. Success against Accila, 494, & seq. Bravery at the battle of Chalons, 495, d, e. Death, ibid. f.

the murderer and successor of Thorismond, 597, f, & seq. Embassies to Requinarius in Spain, 503, a, b. Deseats him, ibid. c. Returns to Tholouse, 505, b. Deseated by Majoranus, ibid. e, f. Sues for peace, ibid. f, & feq. Murdered by his brother, 508, b.

- the fon of Triarius invades Zeno, 515, c. Enters Macedonia, ibid. c. Makes peace with Zeno, 516, a. Success against Leontins, ibid, c. Makes a new treaty with Zeno, ibid. d, c. Invades and fubdues Italy, 517, & feq. Acknowledgedking of it by the emperor, 519, b. Pays a kind of fubmission to him, ibid. c. Assists Mundon against him, 521, 2, b. Favours the Arians, 523, f.

king of Italy delivered up hostage to Leo,

506, f.

Theodoropolis, whence so called, 587, f.

Theodorus put to death for magic and treason, 374, c. d.

Manlius's consulship, 441, e. Rise and character, ibid. & feq.

the reader, his history imperfect, 491, (S). joins in Longinus's revolt, 518, e. Taken and beheaded, ibid. & seq.

prefect of the east, put to death, 538, a. Cappadocian, conspires against Phocas, 538, e. Put to death, ibid. f.

brother of Heraclius's success against Sais, 541, d, e. Defeated by Haumar, 543, b.

revolt and banishment, 601, c, d.

despot of Epirus, 629, e. Treachery to Peter, 630. a. Assumes the purple, ibid. d. Deseated by John, ibid. e. His eyes put out, ibid. & seq. Restored by Azen, 631, d.

Theodosiolus put to death by Valens, 376, a. Not the same with the great Theodosius, 378, c.

Theodosiopolis desended by bishop Eunomius against the Persians, 474, e. Taken by Cabades, 520, c. Retaken by Constantine IV. 555, c.

Theodosius driven out of Spain, 455, d.

Theodosius sent into Britain, 372, c. Success there, revolt and banishment, 601, c, d.

Theodosius sent into Britain, 353, c. Success there, ibid. d, e. In Mauritania, 353, d.—f. Outwited by Firmus, ibid. & seq. Success against him, 360, c, d. Triumphs over him, 361, b. Unjustly put to death by Gratian, 378, b, c. Honours conferred upon him after his death, ibid. &c.

- his son's bravery against the Sarmatians, 362, c, d. Retires into Spain, 378, d. Sent for back by Gratian, 388, e. Success against the Sarmaby Gratian, 388, e. Success against the Sarmatians, ibid. f. Raised to the imperial dignity, 389, c. Singular modesty and valour, ibid. d, e. Extract, rife, &c. 390, a—c. Why called Theodosius, ibid. d. Addressed to by several cities, 392, b, c. Success against the Goths, ibid. & seq. In Thrace, 393, a. Sickness, baptism, and recovery, ibid. b—d. Zeal for orthodoxy, ibid. e. Wholsome laws, 394, a—c. Victory over the Goths, ibid. d—f. Honours to Athanaric highly pleasing to them, 395, d, e. Summons an œcumen. council, ibid, e, f. Success against the Goths, 396, b. Subdues and settles them, 397, b, c. Allies with the revolted Maximus, 402, b. Success against the Saracens, ibid. c. Great sway over Valentinian II. 403, a. Severe laws against idolatry, ibid. d, e, & seq. Against incessuous marriages, 404, c, d. Against heretics, ibid. e. Against fews, ibid. f. Sends plentiss spupplies of corn to Rome, 406, c. Clemency to the conspirators, ibid. e. Success against the Greuthongi, 407. a, b. Clemency to them, ibid. c. Marries Galla, ibid. d. A noble wish of his, 408, a. Insulted by the Antiochians, ibid. b, c. Severity to that ungrateful city, ibid. f. Yet mitigated by him, 409, 2, b. Forgives them wholly at length, 411, e, f. His letter to them, ibid. & seq. Goes to succour Valentinian, 412, c, d. Marches against Maximus, ibid. & seq. Success against him, 413, b-d. Clemency to his adherers, 414, a. To his family, ibid. b. To Valensinian, ibid. c, d. To the Arians, ibid. e, f. Laws against heretics, 415, a, b. Entry into Rome, ibid. b, c. Proves the means of converting that city, ibid. & feq. Clemency to the pagans of Alexandria, 416, f. Demolishes idolatry there and in Egypt, 417, pass. His filver statue reared, 418, b. Laws against apostates and heretics, ibid. c. Marches against the barbarians, ibid. e. Makes dreadful havock of them, ibid. & feq. In great danger from them, 419, a, b. Laws against extortion, 421, e, f. Against the Lycians, ibid. & seq. Marches against Eugenius, 422, d. Fresh laws against heretics, &c. ibid. e, f. Forces the Alps, 423, e, f. Defeats Eugenius, 424, piss. Supposed by a miracle, ibid. e, f. Clemency to the revolted, 425, a, b. To Eugenius's family, ibid. b, c. Divides the empire between Arcadius and Honorius, 426, c, d. His death, obscquies, and character, ibid. & feq. Massacre of the Thessalonians, 427, a-c. Repentance for it, ibid. d, e. Theodosius, his square and column finished at Constantinople, 423, b. - II. the fon of Arcadius born and baptized, 448, e. Created emperor, 449, a. But eight years old when his father dies, 454, f. The peaceful state of his empire, 458, f. 459, a, b. Piously brought up by his mother, 470, c, d. Removes to Eudoxiopolis, 472, b. Refutes to acknowledge Constantius, 473, d. Marries Eudocia, ibid. e, & feq. Wars against the Persians, 474, c-e. De-475, d. Kind reception of Placidia, ibid. f, &c feq. Proclaimed emperor of the seq. Proclaimed emperor of the west, 478, a. Sends Placidia thither, ibid b, c.' Makes her son emperor, 480, a. Makes peace with the Vandals, 483, a. Destroys all the relics of paganism, ibid. d. His code published, 484, b, c. Jealousy of Eudocia, 485, & seq. Sends a steet to Valentinian, 486, c, d. Shameful peace with the Hunns, 487, e. Slavery to Attila, 488, c, d. Makes a more shameful peace with him, 459, c-e. His death and character, 490, d-f.

the son of Ataulphus born, 470, a. Dies in Spain, ibid. d, e.

the ion of Mauritius put to death by Phocas, 536, e.

the brother of Constantius II. put to death by him, 545, b. an obicure person proclaimed emperor, 550. e. Enters Constantinople, ibid. f. Refigns to Leo, 551, a.

Theodota married to Constantine Porphyr. 559, a. Brought to bed of a prince, ibid. c Theodotus defeats Æmilianus, 1St. Why not promoted, ibid. f.

- forgiven and caressed by Julian, 327, d. Theodulus's writings and character, 517, (U).

- a cruel minister of Justinian, 547, d, e. Burnt alive, 518, b.

Theognes the Arian banished, 260, e. Recalled, 262,

Theon's writings and character, 430, in fin. not. Theophanes put to death, 537, f.

Theophania married to Saturatius, 561, e. Retires from the world, 562, e.

Theophano takes the government upon her, 582. Intrigues with Nicephorus, 583, c. Married to him, ibid. e. Treachery to him, 584, d. Banished, 585, b. Recalled, 587, f.

Theophobus, his extract, fuccess, and stratagem against the Saracens, 568, e, f. Singular fidelity to The-ophylus, 569, d, c. Death, 570, c, d. Theophylast, the son of Romanus, designed for the church, 579, c. Dethrones him, 580, c. Falls out with his brother, ibid. d. Banished, ibid. e. Theophylus's writings and character, 84, sub not.

- governor of Syria murdered by Gallas's treachery, 291, 2, b.

— bishop of Alexandria exasperates the heathen, 416, d, e, & feq.

one of the compilers of the Justinian pan-dects, &c. 530, c.

ftratagem against the murderers of Leo, 567, e, f. Ingratitude to Manuel, 569, a. Great ho-nours to him, ibid. c, d. Pardons the revolted Persians, ibid. e. Grief for the loss of Amerium, 570, b. Death and character, ibid. c. Burns his wife's ship, ibid. d.

Theorechnes a magician put to death, 253, e.
Therma in Sicily founded by the Carthaginians, 745, d. Where fituate, 822, (P).

Thermantia, the celebrated daughter of Honorius, 390,

Thermopyla, the streights of, guarded against the Goths, 180, c.

Theron's monument struck with lightning, 746, e. Thervingi driven out by the Hunns, 379, c. Fall foul upon the Romans, 381, b.

Thesmansia, the celebrated mother of Theodosius, 390, the daughter of Stilicho born, 431, e. Married to Honorius, 456, e. Divorced, ibid. Her death, ibid. & feq. Stately tomb discovered, 457, Thessalians deseat Alaric, 449, b.

Thessalonica besieged by the Goths, 180, c. Taken by the Saracens, 575, f. Betrayed to the king of Sicily, 622. b.

Thessalonicans, 7000 massacred by Theodosius, 427, b~d.

Thomas's extract, treason, and conquests, 565, a, b. Repulse before Constantinople, ibid. c, d. Defeats and kills Gregory, ibid. c. Defeated by the Bulgarians, ibid. e, f. Imprisonment and death, 566, a.

Thorismond's bravery at the battle of Chalons, 495, e. Proclaimed king of the Goths, 496, a. Returns home, ibid. c. Repulses Attila, 497, e.

Murdered, ibid. f.
Thoulouse. Vide Toulouse, 469, & seq.
Thrace ravaged by the Goths, 169, pass. 180, c, 381, d. Abandoned to them, 382, a, b. Destroyed by the Quadi, 388, c. Freed by Theodosius, 393, a. Ravaged by the Hunns, 480, c. Repeopled by the barbarians, 498, b. Wasted by the Hunns, 513, a. Ravaged by the Turks, &cc. 636, e, f. 637, b, c.

Thrasybulus foretels Alexander what death he should die, 145, b.

Thundering legion, an account of, 72, pass. Thuscus Arbian. his treason forgiven, 132, 2.

Thysdras, where situate, 153, d. Gordianus proclaimed at, ibid. e.

Tiber overflowed, 26, e. Afresh, 58, f. More dreadfully, 63, b, c. Lays Rome under water, 365, Reckoned ominous, ibid. b.

Adrian's bridge over, 47, 2.
Tiberias burnt by Gallus, 286, b.

Tiberius, an obscure usurper of the empire, 266, b. - Justin's prime minister governs during his madness, 532, e. Created Casar, ibid. f. Chosen emperor, 533, c. Creates Anastasia his empress, ibid. d. Generosity to Hormisdas, ibid. e. Death and character, 534, a.

brother of Conflantine III. disfigured by him,

545, & seq.

- Apsimar deposes and confines Justinian, 548, c. Driven out by him, 549, 2 Put to death, ibid. b. the fon of Justinian II. murdered in a fanctuary, 549, f, & seq. Tigranes yields his share of Armenia to Theodosius, 487, b.

Tigris,

Timens Siculus's writings and character, 739, (F). Timafius sent general against Maximus, 412, f. Commands the Romans against Eugenius, 424, a. Bafely betrayed by Eutropius, 436, e, f. Dreadful banishment, 437 Timolaus the son of Odenatus,, 183, d. Reigns jointly with him, ibid. e, & 189, d. His death, 192, c. Timoleon sent into Sicily, 775, pass. & seq. His success against Icetas, 776, pass. Outwits the Carthaginians, ibid. & seq. Defeats them, 777, & seq. Defends the citadel of Syracuse, 779, b, c. Takes Messana, 780, c. Sends a merry cry after the Carthaginians, ibid. f. Storms Icesas, ibid. & feq. Deposes several tyrants, 781, b—d. Quells a sudden mutiny among his mercenaries, 782, c—e. Defeats the Carthaginians, 783, &c seq. Gets an immense plunder, 785, a—c. Defeats Ice-tas afresh, 786, a. Puts him and his family to death, ibid. b. Defeats Mamereus, ibid. c. Makes peace with Carthage, ibid. d. Timotheus, the Eusychian, raises new troubles, 521, f. Tingitanum taken by Theodosius, 360, c. Tiridates kills the king of Armenia, 63, c. Taken prisoner, ibid. restored to the Armenian crown, 131. Titianus's infulting meffage to Conftantius, 283, f. His heart breaks with that prince's kindness, 288, Tivoli, Adrian's palace at, described, 47, a.
Tocas taken by the Sicilians, 808, d. Where situate, ibid. (Z). Toulouse taken by Asaulphus, 469, 2. Made the metropolis of the Gothish kingdom, 472, f. Besieged by Litorius, 484, c. Texandria, where lited, 303, e, f.

Trading forbid to men of quality, 457, f.

Trajan Ulplus adopted by Nerva, 5, d. Created Cafar, ibid. e. His extract, 6, b. Excellent character, ibid. d, &c. Failings, 7, f, & feq. Whence furnamed Pariesarius, 8, a. Saluted emperor, ibid. -f. Entry and reception at Rome, 9, b, c. Intitled. Optimus, ibid. e. His fingular generofity, ibid. & seq. Modesty, 10, b. Impartiality, ibid. d, e. First war with the Dacians, 11, d. Triumplis over them, 12, c. Finishes the port of Centum-Cella, 13, b, c. Wars against Decebalus, ibid. f, & seq. Builds a bridge over the Danube, abid. f, & feq. Builds a bridge over the Danube, 14, b. Subdues Dacia, ibid. & feq. Cities built by him there, 15, d, e. Triumph and conquests, ibid. & feq. Conspired against, 16, d. Expedition into Parthia, ibid. & feq. Entry into Antioch, 17, a. Presents brought to him there, ibid. d, e. New conquests, 18, & feq. Whether he returned to Rome, 19, d, c. Second expedition against Parthia, 20, & feq. Thence surnamed Parthicus, 21, a. Vast and swift conquests, ibid. & feq. Hurt by an carthquake, ibid. e, f. Sails to the Perssan gulf, 22, b, c. His triumphal arch, 23, a. Expedition against the Hagarens, 24, d. Narrow Expedition against the Hagarens, 24, d. Narrow escape before Atra, ibid. e, f. Falls ill, and embarques for Italy, 25, 2. His death, obsequies, &c. ibid. b, c. Stately works, 26, c, d. Square and column, ibid. d, e. Mistortunes following his death, ibid. e, f. His character, 27, & seq. Cotemporary authors, ibid. fub not. the son of Decius, 168, b. His death, 170, general of Vulens, defeats the Persians, 374, general of Valens, deteats the rerjams, 374, a. Murders the king of Armenia, 376. Sent against the Goths in Thrace, 381, c. Defeated by them, ibid. & seq. Degraded, 382, c. Noble speech to Valens, ibid. s. Death, 384, b.

the castle of, repaired by Julian, 302, a.

the canal of, cleansed by Julian, 332.

Tigris, Trajan's bridge over, 18, f.

Trapefus taken by the Scythians, 174, c. Traustila, the affassin of Valentinian, 499, f. Treacle made by Demetrius for M. Aurelius, 61, f. Treason, men of quality when guilty of, how their estates were disposed of, 394, b, c. The laws against, mitigated, 423, a. Trebelis's kindness to Justinian, 548, f. Recompensed by him, 549, a, b. Success against him, Trebellius Ann. his revolt and death, 182, e. Trebisond, the temple of Mercury at, by whom built, 41, f. Trebonianus, a compiler of the Justinian code, &c. 530, & leq. Treves rebuilt by Conflantine, 238, d. Stands up for Conflantins, 285, f. Burnt by the Franks, 468, c. Triarius sin at Argentaria, 387, b. Tribigil revolts against Arcadius, 442, & seq. In great distress, 443, a, b. Succoured by Gainas, ibid. c. Plundering march against Constantinople, 445, c. Death, 446, 2.

Tripod, an immense one, presented by Gelon, 736, b.

Tripolis, whence so called, 349, c. Tripolitana Libya harasted by the Asturiana, 349, 2. Triton river, 670, e, f. - worshipped at Carthage, 691, d. Trocondus sent against Zeno, 514, d. Revolts, ibid.
e. Taken and beheaded, 516, c. Trogus Pomp. an account of his work, 59, (E). Troies, Troyes, repeopled by the Franks, 212, b. Tubusuplius, the battle of, 359, e.

Tubusuplius, the battle of, 359, e.

Tunes described, 665, & seq. By whom sounded, 666, a, b. Taken by the revolted Africans, 769, c. By Agathocles, and razed, 795, c. Besieged by the Carthaginians, 800, b. Relieved, ibid. e. Taken by the Romans, 838, c. Invaded by the mercenaries, 852, & seq. cenaries, 852, & seq.
Turbo's success against the Jews, 23, f. Made governor of Pannonia, 34, c. Turdulus Gallus's Writings and character, 203, (A). Turin opens her gates to Constantine, 245, c, d. Turinus Vetr. put to a new kind of death for extor-tion, 141, b-d. Turks, their first appearance, 598, e, f. Inlarge their conquests, 603, d. Defeated by Disgenes, 604, b, e, f, Make new inroads, 609, c. Success in Asia, 610, e, f. Deseated by the cruisadors, 615, e, f. By Alexius, 617, b. By John, ibid. f. Make peace, ibid. With Manuel, 620, b, c. Totally depeace, 101d. With Manuel, 020, b, c. Totally defeated by him, ibid. d. Driven out by the Tartars, 630, d, 632, a, b. Success in the Mediterranean, 635, e, f. First invited into Europe, 636, c, d. Betrayed by the Greeks, ibid. e. Their revenge, ibid. f. Victory over Paleologus, 637, b, c. Defeated by Philes, ibid. e, f. Shut up by sea and land, ibid. & seq. Intirely cut off, 638, a, b. New invasion, 620, c, d. Success against Andronicus invalion, 639, c, d. Succels against Andronicus, 641, & seq. Turpentine tree, why abhorred by the Jews, 40, b. Turpilio sacrificed to the mutinous foldiers, 460, c. Tusca, river, one of the limits of Africa Propria, 664, Tyana betrayed by Heraclamon, 190, b. Why spared by Aurelian, ibid. c. Made the metropolis of Cappadocia Secunda, 372, d.
Tyndenjes defeated by Theodosius, 359, c, f. Tyrach defeated by the Romans, 600, a, b.
Tyre declares for Niger, 109, c. Taken and put to the sword, ibid. d.

Tyrians build cities in Spain, 658, c, d. Their bloody worship of Hercules, 690, b. Embassy to the Carthaginians, 787, e, f. Trachus crects a new principality at Smyrna, 612, 2. His treachery to Delassenus, ibid. c. Death, ibid. Tzibus forces the Lazians to revolt, 527, d.

Trajanopolis, Selinus, whence so called, 25, b

Trapefond, the kingdom of, by whom founded, 628, v.

Adomarius's treachery to Julian punished, 312, e. Sent against Procopius, 367, e. Valemir, king of the Goths, where fettled, 496, c. Valens Pinar. chosen commander of the guards,

- fent against Macrianus, 179, c. Takes the purple upon him, ibid. Murdered, ibid. d.

created Casar, 254, e. Deposed, ibid. f.

brother of Valentinian, where born, 346, e.

Promoted by him, 348, b. Chosen his collegue, ibid. c, d. His share of the empire, ibid. f. Goes into Syria, 366, b, c. Sends forces to oppose Procopius, ibid. d—f. Baffled before Chalcedon, 367, a, b. Success against Procopius, ibid. f. Against Marcellus, 369, a. Severity to the revolters, ibid. b, c. Baptized into Arianism, 370, a. Success against the Goths, ibid. & seq. Peace with them, against the Gossi, into & icq. Feace with them, 371, c, d. Cruelty to the orthodox, ibid. f, & feq. Sends forces against Sapor, 373, c, d. Severity against philosophers, &c. 374, & feq. Against the Theodosians, 375, f, & feq. Against Paras, 376, d, e. Peace with Persia, 377, a. Settles the Goths in Thrace, 380, a—c. Assaulted by them, 381, past. Offers a new peace to Sapor, ibid. e. Marches against the Goths, 382, e. Defeated and killed, 384, b-d. His character, 385, past. Fatal jealousy of Gratian, 387, d-f.

Valentia, a new province in Britain, 353, e.

Valentine's revolt suppressed, 353, e. general of Honorius, his narrow escape, 460, 2. Promotion, ibid. c.

Valentinian cashiered by Barbetio, 300, c. Narrow escape, 345, b, c. Chosen emperor, 346, b. His extract, rise, &c. ibid. & seq. Zeal for christianity, 347, 2. Ill used on that account, ibid. b, c. nity, 347, a. Ill used on that account, ibid. b, c. Proclaimed, ibid. e. Intrepid speech to the soldiers, ibid. f, & seq. Divides the empire with Valens, 348, f. Success against the Germans, 351, b—d. Creates his son emperor, 352, b. Whether guilty of bigamy, ibid. f, & seq. Betrayshis cruel temper, 353, f, & seq. Enacts some excellent laws, 254, b, & Success against the alaman. laws, 354, b, &c. Success against the Alemans, ibid. & seq. Countenances Maximin's cruelties, 356, f. Favours the pagans, 357, e. Vain attempt against the Alemans, ibid. f. Severity to Hymereius, &c. 358, b-d. Marches against the Germans, 361, d. Peace with Macrianus, 361, e. Marches into Illyricum, ibid. & feq. Ravages the Quadi, 364, b. Harshness to their embassadors, ibid. c. Sudden death, ibid. d, e. Omens forerunning it; ibid. f. Buried by Theodofius, 365, b. His character, ibid. & feq.

- tribune, racked by Constantius, 305, b. - Galata born, 369, c. His death, 372, b, c.
- II. chosen emperor, 377, d, e. Governed by his mother, 403, a. Defeats the Sarmatians, 405, c. Rebuilds St. Panl's church at Rome, 407, e. Invaded by Maximus, 412, b, c Persuaded to renounce Arianism, ibid. d, e. Succoured by Theodosius, ibid. & seq. Restored by him, 414, Rejects the requelts of the heathen, 419, Desires to be baptized by St. Ambrose, ibid. Murdered, ibid. & feq. His character, obsequies, &c. 420, d—f.

III. the fon of Placidia, born, 473, b. Betrothed to Eudoxia, and created Cafar, 449, c. Crowned emperor, 480, a. Marries Fudoxia, 483, Yields part of Illyricum to Theodofius, ibid. f, & seq. His offspring by Eudoxia, 484, a. Embassy to Attila, 494, b.c. Over-reached by him, ibid. d, e. Second embassy and truce with him, 497, b, c. Murders Etius and his friends, 499, b, c. Murdered by Maximus, ibid. & seq. character, 500, b.

Valeria, the wife of Galerius, ill treated by Maximin, 240, past. Her wandering flight and death, 253, Valeria Severa, the wife of Valentinian, 346, c. H.e. Offspring by him, ibid.

- New Pannonia, whence so called, 211, 2. Valerianus, one of Niger's generals, deteated, 109, e. - Petus put to death by Heliogabalus, 136, e. - chosen censor, 169, f. Sent against Amitianus, 171, c. Proclaimed emperor, ibid. f. His character, rife, &c. 172, d-f. Railes the eighth persecution, 173, e, f. Marches against the Per-sians, 174, 2. Taken prisoner by Sapor, ibid. d. Cruel treatment and death, ibid. e. f.

- master of the horse, slain, 384, b. Valerius Catul. fent against Severus, 105. c. Sides with him, ibid. d.

- Flaceus rescued by Probus, 172, f. Success in Sicily, 826, & seq.

Vallia chosen king of the Goths, 471, 2. Makes peace with Honorius, 472, a. Wholsome advice to him, ibid. b. Success against the Silingi, ibid. And Alani, ibid. His reward and death, ibid. f, & seq.

Vandals over-run Pannonia, 69. b. Repulsed by Anrelian, 188, f. Enter Gaul, 453, d. Defeated by the Franks, ibid. e. Over-run Gaul, 462, b. Spain, ibid.d. Defeated by Ætius, 480, b. run Afric, 482, c, d. Make peace with the Romans, 483, b. Conquests in Afric, 485, a. Repulsed by Majoranus, 505, d.

Vandalusia, whence so called, 463, a.

Varranes fues to Probus for peace, 201, d. Success against the Segetani, 204, d. Defeated by Carns, Restores his conquests to Dioclesian, 207, f.

- murdered, 242, 2, b. chosen consul of the east, 463, b.

renews the war against the Romans, 474, pass. Repulsed before Theodosiopolis, ibid. e. feated, 475, c, d. Makes a hundred years peace, ibid. & seq.

Vates among the Carthaginians, in great escem, 70б, а.

Vatican church built by Constantine, 248, c. Vegetius's writings and character, 429, sub not. Venetia, the country of, abandoned, 496, f.

Venetians, antient, described, 497, 1. Support Gregory II. 552, & feq. Success against R. Gni-feard, 610, 2, 611, b. Assist young Alexius, 625, & feq. At the fiege of Constantinople, 627, d, e. Their share of the empire, 628, a. Settle at Constantinople, 634, c. Recover the islands of the Archipelago, ibid. e, f.

Venice, the foundation of, 495, f, & feq. Ventitianus succeeds Libo in Syria, 65, c. Venus Calva, her temple at Aquileia, 159, b. worshipped at Carthage, 686, pass. Vergetianus killed by an earthquake, 21, d, e. Verianus killed by the Heruli, 184, c.

driven out of Spain, 455, c. Put to death, ibid. e.

Verina obtains Basiliscus's pardon, 509, f. Conspires against Zeno, 513, a, b.

Verona taken by Constantine, 245, d, e. Verronianus's extract and character, 340, a. Made his fon's collegue, ibid. b. His death, ibid.

- the fon of Jovian, made Cafar, ibid. d-f, & leq.

Verus Aurel. Commod. adopted by Adrian, 43, c. Confulfhip, 44, a, b. Sickness and death, ibid. f, & feq. 45, e. Apotheofis and fad character, ibid f.

L. his fon, adopted by Astoninus, 45, 2, 54,
e. Takes the manly robe, 57, f. Despited by Antoninus, 58, b. Made quæstor, 59, a. Consul, ibid. b. Savage disposition, 62, d, e. Created Cafar, and collegue with M. Aurel. ibid. e, f. Sent against Parthieus, 63, c. Against the Parthians, ibid. f, & seq. Horrid debaucheries and negligence, 64, b, c. Success, ibid. & seq. Triumphs over the Parthians, 65, d, c. Spreads the plague where-ever he comes, ibid. & feq. Goes with Aurel. into Germany, 66, c. His death, 67, 2, b. Obsequies and character, ibid. &c. Extravagance and other vices, ibid. e. Supposed to have been poisoned, ibid. f, & seq. Letter concerning Cassius, 75, c, d.

Verus Martius's bravery in Syria, 64, b, c. Informs M. Aurelius of Cassius's conspiracy, 76, a. posed to have been defeated by him, ibid. d. His generosity, &c. ibid. & seq.

L. Ann. the fon of Aurelius, dies in Palesline, Vespronius Candid. sent against Severus, 105, c. Confirms him in the empire, ibid. d. Defeats Niger, 109, b.

Vesta, the temple of, burnt, 92, b.

- the fire of, carried to the temple of Eleagabalus, 136, c.

Vestals deslowered and put to death, 26, f, & seq. Several executed by Caracalla, 124, f. Suppressed by Gratian, 396, e, f.
Vestalias, a dreadful eruption of, 511, d.
Veteranio's revolt in Pannonia, 281, b. Deputation to Constantius, 282, c. Outwitted by him, ibid. e, f. His pious end, ibid. & seq.

Vettones, their pretended stratagem against Hamilcar, 866, b, c.

Vhabalat, the fon of Odenatus, 183, d. His joint reign, ibid. e, & 189, d. Spared by Aurelian, 192, c. Made king of Armenia, 193, b.

Vibo, the antient Hippo, 773, a. Vicars among the Romans, their office, 271, a.

Victims, human, offered by the Romans, &c. 27, 2, b. Forbid by Adrian, 47, f. The priests of them crucified, ibid. & feq. When utterly abolished, 48, a. Practifed by Severus, 111, f. By Heliogabalus, 136, e, f. By the Carthaginians, 679, a, b, 681, d. Abolished by Tiberius, 695, c. The horrid excess of them, ibid. Especially in calamitous times, 696, a, b, (A).

Victobades, who, 285, c. Receive the Sarmatians, ibid. Victor Aurel. made governor of Pannonia Secunda, 313, e. His Writings and character, 317, fub not. made general of Julian's foot, 329, b. Sent to make peace with Persia, 378, e. His advice at the battle of Adrianople rejected, 383, d. Bravery and death, 384, b.

the fon of Maximus, made his collegue, 399, f, & seq. Put to death by Theodosius, 413, e. the younger, his writings and character, 428, Victorina's great sway in Gaul, 184, b.

Victorinus declared partner by Posthumius, 182, d.
His motley character, ibid. e. Murdered by his men, 184, a.

Victory, the temple of, demolished, 277, a. the altar of, destroyed by Gratian, 396, e.

Vienne taken by Gerontius, 466, a.

Vigilantius facrificed to the mutinous foldiers, 460, c, d. Viminacium taken by the Hunns, 488, a.

Vindelicii quelled by Aurelian, 194, c. Subdued by Æ:ius, 481, e, f.

Vindemir invades Italy, 511.

- his fon, abandons it, ibid. f. Vindemius's writings and character, 317, sub not. Vindex defeated at Aquileia, 66, c.

Virgil, whether guilty of anachronism in coupling Dido and Enens, 722, & leq.

Virginius Rufus's consulturp and death, 4, e.
Virgius protected by fovian, 344, d.
Visigoths, who, and where settled, 496, b. Deseated by Ægidius, 507, d. More successful in Spain, ibid. c. In Gaul, ibid. f.

Visimar killed by the Goths, 265, b.

Visalianus put to death by Gordianus, 153, f. raifes a revolt in favour of the orthodox, 522, a, b. Over-reached by Anastasius, ibid. b, c. Consulship, and death for treason, 523, b, c.

Viebicalius effafficated, 353. b. Vithimir killed by the Hunns, 379 e. Vitulus Q. Man. success in Sicily, 829, & seq. Vitus deteated in Spain, 488, t. Uladiflaus defeated and killed, 618, d. Uldes defeats Gainas, and fends his head to Arcadius, 467, d, e.

Uldin fent against the Goths, 452, d. Driven out of Thrace, 459, c.

Ulphilus, a Gothish bishop, corrupts them with Arianifm, 380, a, b. Stratagem against Constantine, 466, f.

Ulpianus Dom. made countellor to Papianus, 117, c. To Alexander, 138, d. Murdered by the pratotorian guards, 139, c.

Ulpius Marcellus's success in North Britain, $7, d.
Ill requited by Commodus, ibid. e.

—— Julianus's timely advice to Macrinus, 128,
d. Sent against Heliogabalus, 133, b. His head fent to Macrinus, ibid. d.

Vologefes's complaint to Adrian, 43, 2. Revo'ts against the Romans, 63, d. Signal victory over them, libid. e, f. Defeated by Cassius, 65, b, c. Wars against Severus, 113, & seq. Peace with him, 114, d. Volusianus declared Casar, 170, e. His various names, 171, a. Death, ibid. d.

Vopiscus's character of Suetonius, 52, sub not. Writings and character, 220, (C).

Ur, where situate, 342, f.
Urania worshipped at Carthage, 685, & seq.

Uranus's revolt and defeat, 139, f.

Urban II. encourages the holy war, 613, e, f.

IV. supports the tyrant Paleologus, 634, f. Ursacius disobliges the Germans into a revolt, 350, Ursieinus opposes Gallus's misconduct, 291, f, & seq. Goes to Rome, 292, c. Natrowly escapes death, 294, a. Sent against Sylvanus, 295, e, f. Treacherously murders him, ibid.e, f, & seq. Stripped of his power, 297, a, b. Restored, and sent into the east, 299, f, & feq. Betrayed by Eusebius, 306, b-d. Gallant behaviour there, ibid. & feq. Tried and difgraced, 307, e, f, & feq.

Urfula ungratefully put to death by Julian, 325, b, c. - the martyr, and her 11,000 virgins, the story of, exploded, 401, a, b.

Urjus ordered to affilt the African clergy, 251, f. - the murderer of Maximus, 501, 2.

Usher, archbishop, vindicated and cleared up, 719,

Usica described, 665, c. Becomes the metropolis of Afric, ibid. e. Taken by Agathosles, 807, & seq. By Regulus, 838, c. Revolts to the mercenaries, 861, c, d.

Usicans come to congratulate Dido's arrival, 721, d. Utilis, one of Faustina's gallants, promoted, 78, e. Vulcatius Terentius's writings and character, 165, sub not. 220. (C).

Uzians, who, 603, d. Invade the Romans, ibid. Defeated by the Hungarians, ibid. e, f.

Uzita, where fituated, 670, c.

Ar, the noble, why so called, 556, 2. holy. See Cruifade, 613, & seq. Widows forbid to marry during the year, 394, a William, lord of Sicily, wars against Andronicus, 622, ь, с.

Wine forbid the Carthaginian foldiers whilst in the field, 705, c. And to the magistrates during their office, 706, b.

Wool rains down in Artois, 354, b.

Work-honses among the Romans abused, 48, 2. Regulated by Adrian, ibid b.

Wormes taken by the Vandals, 453, f.

X.

TAntippus succours the Carthaginians, 839, c, d. New disciplines them, ibid. d, e. Defeats the Romans, ibid. & feq.

Xene sent prisoner to Constantinople, 639, e. Released, Renidocus chosen general of the Agrigentines, 802, a. His success in Sicily, ibid. b. Deteated by Demophilus, 808, b.

Xenophon, a commander under Arrianus, 41, f. Xiphilin's abridgment of Dio Cassius imperfect, 19, c, 150, fub not. His account of Antoninus Pius, 55, & seq. Of the Thundering legion, 72, pass. His character, 150, sub not.

- the patriarch, outwitted by Endocia, 604, d,

Xiphius's revolt and submission, 593, a.

Y.

TEar of the Carthaginians, how computed, 712, Tasdejird king of Persia. See Jisdegerdes, 442, b.

Z.

Abache, the fea of, where, 379, c. Zabas defeated by the Romans, 190, e. Zacnarias, patriarch of Jerusalem, carried prisoner by the Persians, 539, c. Zagan diverts Mohammed from railing the fiege of Constantinople. 652, b.

Zagaria given to Trebelis, 549, b. Zauha, Zantha, Gordian buried at, 164, b. His tomb at, 331, d.

Zantiehes, king of the Jaziges, his submission to M. Aurelius, 73, d.

Zamma murdered by his brother, 359, a.

Zarxas joins with the revolted mercenaries, 862,

Zea, St. the church of, built by Marcian, 504, c. Zeno marries Ariadne, 510, a. His extract and rife, ibid. b, c. Promotion opposed by the Romans, 511, f. Declared his son's collegue, 512, 2. His wicked character and flight, 513, 2, b. Pursued into Isaria, 514, d. Dethrones Basiliseus, ibid. & feq. Shameful peace with Theodoric, 515, c. Besieged by Marcian, ibid. d. Yields Italy to Theodorie, 516, c. Cruelties and death, ilid. f, & feq. Character, 517, b.

Zenobia, the wife of Odenatus, 177. c. Made queen,

178, b. With the title of Augusta, 182, b. Whether accessory to her husband's death, 183, d. Her reign, ibid. & feq. Conquers Egypt, 187. Her pedigree, learning and bravery, 189, c-e. Noble exploits, ibid. e, f. Defeated by Aurelian, 190, d, c. Brave defence of Palmyra, ibid. e, f. Letter to Aurelian, 191, a. Purlued and taken in her flight, ibid. c. Led in triumph under a huge weight of jewels, 192, e. Her retirement and death, 193, a, b.

Zenobius's writings and character, 51, sub not. - bishop, whether descended from queen Zenobia, 193, b.

Zenonides, Zeno's wife, declared Augusta, 513, b, c. Her death, 515, 2.

Zenus's success against Alexander, 241, c. Zermisegethusa, by whom founded, 15, d.

Zeugitania described, 665, b, c. The sea and inland towns of, 667, & feg.

Zimisces, John, his success against the Saracens, 583, f. Ill requited by Nicephorus, 584, c. Murders Submission to Polyenrins, ibid. f. him, ibid. Crowned, 585, a. Takes Romanus for his part-ner, ibid. b. Success against the Rossi, ibid. & seq. Peace with them, 187, a. Poisoned, ibid. c. His character, ibid. f.

Zizais made king of Sarmatia, 303, d, e. - put to death by Phocas, 538, a. Zochares defeated before Antioch, 585, b.

Zoe I. married to Leo, and dies, 575, b.

II. the mother of Constantine, ibid. Banished by Alexander, 577, f. Recalled by her fon, 578, c. Takes the government upon her, ibid. d. Defeated by the Bulgarians, 578, f, & seq. Confined by Romanus, 579, c.

- Confiantine's daughter, married to Romanus II. 594, b. Poisons and murders him, 595, c, d. Marries Michael, and makes him emperor, ibid. e, f. Over-reached by his brother, 596, b, c. Confined by Calaphates, 597, c. Recalled, ibid. d, e. Marriage, 598, a. Death, 600, f.

Zoganus commands at the fiege of Constantinople, 650, d, e.

Zolicus, Heliogabalus's beastly husband, 135, c. Zonaras's abridgment of Dio Cassius, 150, sub not. Account of Macrianus's usurpation, 179.

Zorus's expedition to Carthage, 658, b, c Zofimus, an enemy to the christians, 166, d. His history truncated, 220, c. Partiality against Confantine the Great, 269, c, d. Centured and confuted, ibid. e. Against Theodosius, 392, e. Zow aan, mount, where situate, 800, (M). Zuphons, a tribe of the Numidians, 804. (Q).

Zydreta, where fituated, 37, a.